steep street which apparently leads past nothing more exciting than a wall of rock, which is, in fact, the bastion of the old fortress. At the side of this wall is a narrow winding path which apparently disappears into a shadowed opening. Climb this and pass beneath the fortress walls, and, magically, you come out right in the heart of the market square.

There are few towns or cities to which one makes such sudden, miraculous entry. One moment there is the steep climb up an apparent mule track in silence broken only by the hum of insects in the ivy clinging to the rocks around. The next, a dramatic emergence into a street shaded by deep arcades, gay with baskets and tubs of flowers, glittering at intervals with gilded, painted fountains, and brought to a full stop a tone end by the main gateway of the castle and the arched, gilded Berne Tower at the other.

Should it be a Sunday morning the scene will be more dramatic still. For Morat lies just between the French Canton Vaud and the German Canton of Bern; and while the bells peal and clash over the town, the Vaudois peasants in their Sunday costumes will enter by the castle gate at the same moment that the Bernese, decorated with silver chains and wearing high white head-dresses, file through to church from under the great Bernese Tower. After church, there is a church parade, two-and-two round the old walls with their twisted tourelles which lead up and down from the street far below, under a tiled roof rose-red with age and propped up by huge ancient timbers.

Yes, Morat is a magic city. But there are others. There is, for example, Colombier, the City of Doves, which, considering it is only a tram-ride from Neuchâtel, is easy enough to discover. Again, on being set down at the wayside halt (inland this time), one climbs a hill shaded by age-old trees and terminating in a huge mediaeval castle, now used as a barracks, where on Sunday mornings a military band discourses to all who care to stand there listening. The swallows, frightened by the noise, dart out from under the eaves. The Swiss flag, white cross on red ground, flaps overhead lazily in the warm air, and on the Overture to William Tell being brought to its exciting close the little crowd of Sunday pleasure-seekers drift through the opposite gateway into the town with its geranium-hung balconies, its ancient stone fountains, reading as they pass the quaint texts and rhymes above the doorways of the timbered houses. The streets of Colombier twist and turn so entrancingly, and contain so many charming flowered squares and corners, that it is hard to remember the awaiting tram below the castle hill and harder still to find the way out of this unspoiled maze—unless, indeed, one decides to put up at the spotless little hotel-restaurant for a night or two.

And lastly, there is Biel, even more get-at-able since it lies on the main Paris-Bern line. Biel is at first sight far from being one of the unknown towns of Switzerland. Unlike Morat or Colombier, it has moved with the times and possesses a modern industry of its own. Nowadays it is the centre of the watchmaking trade, having displaced Geneva many years ago. But that fact as much as any other has led tourists, thinking it a mere commercial centre, to neglect it.

They make a great mistake, since behind a modern façade of skyscrapers and factories (including the world-famous Omega watch factory) there lies, complete and untouched, a perfect little town of the Middle Ages. Again you pass under a narrow archway at a corner of one of the main streets, and here, fantastic as the setting for an opera, lies a cobbled square with a gilded statue of a man-at-arms in the centre. Round about it are the high-peaked gables of the ancient palace of the Prince-Bishops; the Lodge of the Company of Verderers; the little shops, each with its painted signboard still swinging before the door.

Let it not be forgotten, too, that the two healthful climatic stations of Leubringen and Magglingen, complete with comfortable hotels, stand on hills above the town and are reached by funicular.

SY SCHWYZERREIS.

Sit Jahre het er planget
Und jede Rappe gspart,
Bis d's Gältli endli glanget
Het, für syni Schwyzerfahrt.

Er fühl grad wie a Crösus,
So glücklich, rich und froh,
Doch leider, oft im Labe,
Zur Freud, muess z'Unglück cho.

Er wanderet i syr Fieberhascht,
In eitler Träumerei,
Bärg uf und ab, es git ke Rascht,
I Fieber Eli, hei.

Zum Hei, wo uf em Hubel stoht,
Mit em Brunne, vor em Hus
Und der Schysterbygi näbe dra,
Mit Gerania obe druf.

Chüeli weide uf der Alp,
Saftig Matte, chan er gseh,
Und düre dunkelgrüne Wald
Sy liebe Himmelblaue See.

Näbem Hus, das klare Bächli,
Mit de Bluemeli am Rand,
Ghört, bätte still sy's Muetterli,
Für sy's Wohl, im fremde Land.

Ihm rolle Träne über's Gsicht,
Müed sehnt er sich nach Ruch,
Und z'friede, seit sy letzte Blick,
Gortlob, i bi daheim.

SWISS NATIONAL EXHIBITION 1939.

A Swiss National Exhibition will take place at Zurich from May to October 1939. The event is to place "Switzerland on parade" in all its phases and elaborate plans are also being made for the festive entertainment of the visitors. Attractions promised so far will include Gala Concerts by Folk Music Groups and Choirs; a Festival of the Guilds; a Peasants' Day; a Costumes Festival; a "Working-men's Day;" a "Railroad Workers' Day;" a Yodeling Fête; Athletic Contests; Wrestling and Alpine Festivals; Cattle Shows; Horse Shows, etc., also 20 performances of a Festival Play.

During the Exhibition period the beautiful city of Zurich will also be hostess to the following International Congresses, their respective dates still to be determined:

1. International Congress for Therapeutics.
2. International Union for Life Saving and First Aid in Accidents.
3. International Association of Skat-Clubs.
4. International Congress for Documentation.
5. International Congress for Animal Raising.
6. International Congress of Custom-Tailors.
7. International Federation of Scientific Agriculturists; International Congress for Chemical Fattening.
8. International Congress of Shoe Merchants.
9. International Amateur Film Congress.
10. Congress of Continental Advertising League.
11. General Assembly of International Pharmaceutical Federation.
12. International Conference of Retail Dealers in Foodstuffs.
13. International Congress for Psycho-technique.
14. International Congress for Horticultural Art.
15. Congress of Delegates of International Committee for the Uses of Timber.
16. Meeting of the Executive Committee of the International League of Women for Peace and Liberty.

The Exhibition will occupy two extensive park areas on both shores of the lake of Zurich, in closest vicinity to the centre of the city, and it has been planned in such a manner that visitors will always enjoy a view of the lake and the Alps.
