THE IMPORTANCE OF DREAMS

On 12th March, the Parish Council of the German-speaking Swiss Church organised an open meeting attended by some 50 members and friends of the Church, including Minister and Madame Fritschi. After supper, served in the friendly hall of the Church in Endell Street, the psycho-analyst Baroness Vera von der Heydt gave a talk on "The World of Dreams". The speaker who has been in practice in this country since the early 'thirties, drew on vast knowledge and experience. She stressed from the beginning that she was a psycho-analyst, not a witch doctor. For centuries, dreams had played a big part in tribal lives, and, of course, there was plenty of evidence of important dreams in the Bible. For a long time, science was suspicious of dreams, and it was not until Freud and Jung re-discovered dreams as paths to the inner world of a human being, that more importance began once again to be given to the dream world.

Jung deepened the whole concept of the unconscious, and with it the widened significance of dreams which were prospects for the soul. Artists, writers, religious leaders, even scientists, now find answers to problems in dreams.

Some people say they don't dream, but that, said the speaker, was not true – everybody dreamt, and with people who say they don't one has to ask the question: what are they afraid of? What do they not want to know about themselves? Dreams show us our attitudes to people and problems; they force us to be aware of our darker sides; they give the key to correct mistakes we made, but also make us experience the presence of wisdom and goodness in ourselves, qualities we did not know we had.

"A dream", said the Baroness, "has to be deciphered, for we are often surrounded by familiar or unknown people, strange animals and things. Our dream ego is generally of the same sex, usually the same age, often younger, seldom older."

In dreams there are no laws of gravity, time, place – we can experience floating bodies, be paralysed or excessively sensitive. We can play an active or a passive part, but every time we see an aspect of ourselves. Sometimes we experience anxiety, feel inadequate, accused, persecuted, even attacked, but invariably, our dream ego deals with a problem. There are also dreams in which we have succeeded and not given in, and we wake up encouraged. It all depends on the attitude of the conscious ego. It is that which gets us into a mess, so we must watch carefully!

The speaker gave a number of examples of dreams and how they helped in analysing a person's problems. From an analytical point of view, very long dreams were not the most important ones. Dreams, she said, were mirrors in which the conscious ego could recognise the dream ego. When they could be reconciled, changes could be effected. In dreams we could discover our total personality, body, soul, mind and spirit.

The speaker also dealt briefly with prophetic dreams and extra-sensory perception, though this type of dream was far more complex and more difficult to explain.

A vivid discussion followed the talk, and the Rev. Uli Stefan and Mrs. Edith Crack, Chairman of the Parish Council, closed the meeting by thanking Baroness von der Heidt for dealing with such a fascinating subject in a most intelligible manner. The audience supported this by warm applause.
