

Zeitschrift:	Asiatische Studien : Zeitschrift der Schweizerischen Asiengesellschaft = Études asiatiques : revue de la Société Suisse-Asie
Herausgeber:	Schweizerische Asiengesellschaft
Band:	34 (1980)
Heft:	2
Artikel:	Self-cultivation for the governance of men : the beginnings of neo-Confucian orthodoxy in Yi Korea
Autor:	Deuchler, Martina
DOI:	https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-146587

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist die Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften auf E-Periodica. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Zeitschriften und ist nicht verantwortlich für deren Inhalte. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern beziehungsweise den externen Rechteinhabern. Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen sowie auf Social Media-Kanälen oder Webseiten ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Mehr erfahren

Conditions d'utilisation

L'ETH Library est le fournisseur des revues numérisées. Elle ne détient aucun droit d'auteur sur les revues et n'est pas responsable de leur contenu. En règle générale, les droits sont détenus par les éditeurs ou les détenteurs de droits externes. La reproduction d'images dans des publications imprimées ou en ligne ainsi que sur des canaux de médias sociaux ou des sites web n'est autorisée qu'avec l'accord préalable des détenteurs des droits. En savoir plus

Terms of use

The ETH Library is the provider of the digitised journals. It does not own any copyrights to the journals and is not responsible for their content. The rights usually lie with the publishers or the external rights holders. Publishing images in print and online publications, as well as on social media channels or websites, is only permitted with the prior consent of the rights holders. Find out more

Download PDF: 22.01.2026

ETH-Bibliothek Zürich, E-Periodica, <https://www.e-periodica.ch>

SELF-CULTIVATION FOR THE GOVERNANCE OF MEN: THE BEGINNINGS OF NEO-CONFUCIAN ORTHODOXY IN YI KOREA

MARTINA DEUCHLER
University of Zurich

For Yi dynasty Korea (1392–1910), neo-Confucianism served many purposes. The scholar-officials of the new dynasty, the sadaebu, adapted neo-Confucianism to Korea and used it as an ideological tool to transform Korean society in support of their claim to power. Neo-Confucianism gave access to the socio-political wisdom that lay stored away in China's classical literature. At the inception of the dynasty, this wisdom became the model for building a Korean Confucian society. Neo-Confucianism was also a moral way of life that demanded the cultivation of inner discipline and redefined the individual's relationship and commitment to kin and state. Moreover, neo-Confucianism functioned as philosophical armament against Buddhism. Neo-Confucianism at the beginning of the Yi dynasty possessed dynamic and activist qualities.¹

This study explores the process through which the Learning of the Way (Chin. tao-hsüeh; Sino-Kor. tohak) – that is, neo-Confucian thought as developed in Sung China (960–1279) by the Ch'eng brothers, Ch'eng I (1033–1107) and Ch'eng Hao (1032–1085), and Chu Hsi (1130–1200) – was adapted and propagated in Korea as a method of self-cultivation as well as a means of governing people. The adherents of the Way came to see themselves as the guardians and the true practitioners of the neo-Confucian mission and thus took pains to establish themselves as the «rightful» transmitters of the Way. To legitimize their claim to ideological purity, they had to construct a creditable line of transmission. Who was capable of receiving, preserving, and handing on the Way in Korea?

The research upon which this work is based was made possible by a grant from the Swiss National Science Foundation. I am grateful to Susan S. Shin and Sandra Mattielli who read and commented upon an earlier version of this paper.

1 For a discussion of the social function of neo-Confucianism in Korea, see Martina Deuchler, «Neo-Confucianism: The Impulse for Social Action in Early Yi Dynasty Korea,» The Journal of Korean Studies, vol. 2 (1980).

One way of tracing the development of Confucian orthodoxy is to study the procedure by which the «rightful» transmitters were identified and officially honored, after their deaths, as the guardians of orthodoxy. Orthodoxy needs a historical dimension to sustain its authority and to assure its continued official recognition. The clarification of the «succession of the Way» (Chin. tao-t'ung; Sino-Kor. tot'ong) had been a central concern of the Sung neo-Confucians.² In Korea, this concern gained an additional dimension: how could the Way be connected to the Chinese tradition?

No other book of the Confucian canon suited the adherents of the Way better than the Ta-hsüeh (Great Learning). This small treatise, by tradition considered to be the product of the immediate post-Confucian period and selected by Chu Hsi as one of the Four Books, set forth a systematic and pragmatic program that combined the imperative of moral education with the urgent appeal to political action. The Ta-hsüeh sustained the neo-Confucians' claim to complete mastery over the totality of public and private life. Moreover, by taking recourse to the sage kings of Chinese antiquity, it lent credibility to the manner in which the Korean Confucians went about their tasks. It also provided the Koreans with a firm point of view in their struggle against Buddhism. Living in a Buddhist milieu that was shaped by a strong syncretic tradition, the Confucians considered themselves in real danger of being pulled into the vast caldron of Buddhist thought. The repulsion of Buddhism was therefore a condition for survival.

Throughout the first two hundred years of the Yi dynasty, the Ta-hsüeh was recognized inside and outside the government as one of the most important Confucian texts because it contained the «right words» for many purposes. The edition most widely used was Chen Te-hsiu's (1178–1235) Ta-hsüeh yen-i (Extended Meaning of the Great Learning) in which Chen expanded and elucidated the brief text of the Ta-hsüeh with examples from the classics and gave it relevance to the contemporary situation by adding materials from historical works.³

2 Cf., Wing-Tsit Chan, «Chu Hsi's Completion of Neo-Confucianism,» Études Song – Sung Studies. In Memoriam Étienne Balasz, ed. by Françoise Aubin (Paris, 1973), pp. 59–90.

3 Chen Te-hsiu's thought is studied in Wm. Theodore de Bary, «The Neo-Confucian Learning of the Mind-And-Heart.» I am grateful to Prof. de Bary for letting me read this unpublished paper.

I The Beginnings of the Way

The center of learning during the last decades of the Koryō period (935–1392) was the Confucian Academy (Sōnggyun'gwan), which was re-established in 1367 after a long period of decay. The best known Confucians of the time were the appointed teachers, and after the daily teaching sessions they gathered to debate outstanding problems of neo-Confucian thought. This was an intellectual exchange that differed markedly from the earlier mechanical internalization of the classical wisdom. The leader of these disputations was Yi Saek (1328–1396) who, as a youth, had immersed himself in neo-Confucian studies while staying in the capital of Yüan China (1279–1368) for almost three years. Later, in 1354, he earned top honors in the highest civil service examinations in Peking. Although Chu Hsi's Four Books had been transmitted to Korea at the end of the thirteenth century⁴ and certainly had been studied, Yi Saek presided over the first large-scale debates about the new literature. He is credited with having chaired the sessions skillfully because he «was analytical and was able to reconcile [differing opinions].»⁵ Yi Saek thus helped shape an intellectual milieu from which the most inspiring thought of the time emerged.

One of the most fervent debaters was Chōng Mong-ju (1337–1392). Calling literary composition a «peripheral art,» he found the «teachings of body and mind» (sinsim chi hak) all embodied in the Ta-hsüeh and the Chung-yung (Doctrine of the Mean). With a friend, he is said to have retreated to a Buddhist hermitage to study these books. At the Confucian Academy he expounded the meaning of the Four Books, and his interpretations were found to match those of Hu Ping-wen's (1250–1333) Ssu-shu t'ung (Interpretations of the Four Books) so closely that, when the latter work was brought to Korea, Chōng's colleagues' respect for him increased rapidly. Because his works, except for some poetry, were lost in the turmoil surrounding his death in 1392, an assessment of Chōng's thought is not possible, and one must rely on a brief entry in his biography: «He widely read a lot of books and daily recited the Ta-hsüeh and the Chung-yung. He investigated the principle (i) and thereby perfected his knowledge; he searched in himself to give it practical expression. He truly exerted himself for a long time and thus, unaided, resolved the mysteries [the solution of which] the Sung Confucians had not transmitted.» Yi Saek worded his admiration for Chōng thus: «When Mong-ju discusses the principle, none of his theories misses it.» It was Yi Saek who called Chōng the «ancestor of the Eastern [Korean] school of principle (ihak).»⁶

4 The transmission of neo-Confucian thought to Korea is studied in Yun Yong-gyun, Shushigaku no denrai to sono eikyō ni tsuite (1933).

5 Yi Saek's obituary is in T'aejo sillok, 9: 6b–8. For a detailed biographical study, see Hans-Jürgen Zaborowski, Der Gelehrte und Staatsmann Mogün Yi Saek (1328–1396) (Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz, 1976). Yi Saek's father, Yi Kok (1298–1351), also passed the Chinese civil service examinations. Their teacher was Yi Che-hyōn (1287–1367), an eminent scholar who visited Yüan China a couple of times. A more detailed study of the intellectual exchange between Koryō Korea and Yüan China is overdue.

The Ta-hsüeh was also recommended as essential reading for the king. When the last king of Koryō, Kongyang (r.1389–1392), wanted to see the Chen-kuan cheng-yao, a compendium on government policy of the chen-kuan period (627–649), he was admonished that T'ang T'ai-tsung (r.626–649) was not a sufficient model. Instead, the king was advised to read the Ta-hsüeh yen-i to familiarize himself with the rule of the sage emperors and kings.⁷

For Yi Saek and Chōng Mong-ju and others with whom they shared the rostrum at the reestablished Confucian Academy – Kim Ku-yong (1338–1384), Pak Sang-ch'ung (1332–1375), and Yi Sung-in (1349–1392)⁸ – the discovery and disputation of neo-Confucian thought was an intellectual adventure that liberated them from the dull routine of traditional scholarship. Their teachings contained the elements of a moral and political plan of action, but in the waning years of Koryō, disrupted by party strife and marked by the Buddhist heritage, neither Yi nor Chōng could or would draw the ultimate consequences from the Confucian message. Yi was later stigmatized as a compromiser with Buddhism, and Chōng died as a Koryō loyalist in his vain attempt to prevent the establishment of a new dynasty in 1392.

6 Chōng Mong-ju's biography is in Koryōsa (reprint, Seoul, 1955), 117: 1–20. There is another short biography, written by Ham Chōl-lin and dated 1410, in Chōng's collected works, P'oǔn sōnsaeng-jip (reprint, Seoul, 1959), 4: 30b–39. Some personal reminiscences of his contemporaries are found in Chōng To-jön, «P'oǔn pongsago sō,» of 1386 in Sambong-jip (reprint, Seoul, 1961), pp. 89–91. Pak Chong-hong tries to reconstruct the contours of Chōng's thought on the basis of Hu Ping-wen's Ssu-shu t'ung. See Pak Chong-hong, «Tongbang ihak ūi chorosō ūi Chōng P'oǔn,» Han'guk sasangsa non'go (Seoul, 1977), pp. 24–29.

7 Koryōsa, 106: 34a–b; 120: 12b.

8 Chōng To-jön, Sambong-jip, p. 370.

Yet, Yi Saek and Chöng Mong-ju inspired a sense of mission in others – men who had no scruples about joining Yi Söng-gye (1335–1408) in founding the Yi dynasty. Certainly their most prominent disciple was Chöng To-jön (?1337–1398), who was highly rewarded for his contributions to the new dynasty.⁹ Combining depth of scholarship with political acumen and ambition, Chöng «made the elucidation of the Learning of the Way and the repulsion of heterodox teachings [i.e. Buddhism] his own responsibility.»¹⁰ His contemporary and commentator, Kwön Kün (1352–1409), connected Chöng directly to the Mencian tradition. As Mencius (371–289 B.C.?) had to put an end to heterodox doctrines to carry on the work of the three sages (Yü, the Duke of Chou, and Confucius),¹¹ Chöng was compelled to wipe out Buddhism to succeed Mencius. By teaming up with an enlightened ruler (i.e. Yi T'aejo, r.1392–1398), Chöng was able, Kwön stated, to restore the kingly influence (wanghwa) and to build a political order (ch'i) for a full age.¹²

Undoubtedly, Chöng To-jön was a most remarkable personality, the prototype of the ubiquitous scholar-official of the Yi dynasty, whose broad erudition and copious oeuvre seems to eclipse the works of his contemporaries. His philosophical treatises, however, were written with the aim of delineating the Confucian point of view vis-à-vis the Buddhist challenge and thus carried a decidedly militant overtone; they were not intended as introductory texts. The stated purpose of Kwön Kün's Iphak tosöl (Illustrated Treatises for the Beginner) of 1390 was to give an overview of the key concepts of neo-Confucian thought. It tackled its didactic task by supplementing the abstract text with diagrams. Original neither in content nor layout – Kwön relied on a number of Chinese models, most notably on Chou Tun-i's (1017–1073) T'ai-chi-t'u shuo (An Explanation of the Diagram of the Great Ultimate) – Kwön's booklet was immensely influential as a convenient guide through the maze of neo-Confucian philosophy. It was reproduced a number of times during the first centuries of the Yi dynasty.¹³

9 Chöng To-jön was made a merit subject, first class (kaeguk kongsin) in 1392.

10 Kwön Kün, commentary to Chöng To-jön's Simgirip'yön, in Sambong-jip, p. 286.

11 The Works of Mencius, Bk. 1, Pt. 2, Chap. 9, Sec. 13.

12 Kwön Kün, «Preface» to Chöng To-jön's Pulssi chappyön (dated 1398) in Sambong-jip, pp. 277–278. For a full study of Chöng To-jön's thought, see Han Yöng-u, Chöng To-jön sasang üi yön'gu (Seoul, 1973).

13 The Iphak tosöl is available in a modern translation by Kwön Tök-chu, vol. 131 of Üryu mun'go (Seoul, 1974). Kwön's works also include commentaries to the Five Classics and the Li Chi.

Kwǒn Kǔn was fully committed to the new dynasty and claimed the «succession of the Way» (tot'ong) as the privilege of the scholar-official, as represented by Chǒng To-jǒn. But he was not intolerant. It was Kwǒn who pushed for the recognition of those of his colleagues who had not joined forces with the dynastic founder. He advocated that a scholar (sa) should have the option of staying away from government service without being penalized. He had his teacher, Chǒng Mong-ju, and his disciple, Kil Chae (1353–1419), in mind. He recommended them for official recognition because of their loyalty to the former dynasty and their moral integrity (chōrūi).¹⁴ Whereas Chǒng died as a Koryǒ loyalist in 1392, Kil Chae had retired from government service as early as 1390 when he became convinced that the royal house of Koryǒ was doomed. Kil refused to take office again at the beginning of the Yi dynasty with the argument that «a loyal subject cannot serve two lords.» Although Kwǒn admitted that Kil's stubbornness was somewhat extreme, Kil was granted royal pardon.¹⁵

Even though Kwǒn mentioned Chǒng and Kil in one breath, there is no evidence that Kil regarded himself as the successor of Chǒng Mong-ju's loyalism and formed a «party of dissent.»¹⁶ He did urge his son to enter public office. Rather, Kil's ambitions seem to have been primarily scholarly. He is said to have spent his days absorbed in studying neo-Confucian writings and translating his understanding directly into the practice of a ritually pure life. His scholarly reputation attracted a great number of students.¹⁷

The dilemma of the Confucians who were trained during the last decades of Koryǒ and who witnessed the founding of the Yi dynasty lay in their dual mission. They had to define, in an essentially non-Confucian milieu, the norms for the building of a Confucian state, and they had to maintain their commitment to the propagation of the Way. Under the circumstances they were facing, the Confucians had no choice but to tackle the constructive and educative tasks first – to find in the Confucian classics the models for building a Confucian society. This demanded an extraordinary amount of painstaking research and social experimentation.

14 Chōngjōng sillok, 5: 8; T'aejong sillok, 1: 7a–b.

15 Sejong sillok, 3: 31–32; Kil Chae, Yaǔn sǒnsaeng ὅnhaeng sǔbyu (reprint, Seoul, 1959), 1: 14–20b. The biography was written by Kil's disciple, Pak Sō-saeng in 1422.

16 Key P. Yang and Gregory Henderson discuss dissent at the beginning of the Yi dynasty in their «An Outline History of Korean Confucianism. Part I: The Early Period and Yi Factionalism,» Journal of Asian Studies, 18.1: 88–89 (Nov. 1958).

17 Only fragments of Kil Chae's work are extant so that a full assessment of his thought is not possible.

Little mental power could be spared for absorbing and developing the more abstract and idealistic aspects of neo-Confucianism. It was a matter of stacking priorities: the majority opted for participation in the political process; a few kept to the books. They did not act as antagonists. All of them were the builders of Confucian orthodoxy.

II Self-cultivation versus Governance of Men

The scholar-officials and the scholar-teachers of the early Yi dynasty shared the view that Confucian learning was relevant for the individual as well as for society. Kwǒn Kǔn, the scholar-official, spoke of learning as the instrument for bringing people under control (ch'i) by activating their moral nature. This «relevant learning» (sirhak), which stood in contrast to a mechanical internalization of the classics that had no practical application, had two closely related dimensions: it stimulated the process of self-realization with the ultimate aim of finding the Way in oneself, and it developed the proper human relations between ruler and subject, father and son, older and younger, and friends so that everyone would come to know his proper station in life. Both the search for the Way and the enrichment of human morality had to concentrate on the teachings of the Three Dynasties (Hsia, Shang, and Chou) and on the classics.¹⁸

Kwǒn Kǔn's thinking was clearly guided by the Ta-hsüeh to which he devoted a chapter in his Iphak tosōl. Kwǒn interpreted the essence of the Ta-hsüeh as consisting of two processes. The first was a series of «efforts» (kongbu) that would lead to the most fundamental of actions, the investigation of things and the extension of knowledge. The successful completion of this basic step would initiate the second process, a series of «effects» (konghyo), that would bring about universal peace in the world.¹⁹ This message was not lost on the ruler. King T'aejong (r. 1400–1418) was an avid reader of the Ta-hsüeh. He had the full text of Chen Te-hsiu's Ta-hsüeh yen-i written in large characters on the palace walls for all officials to see. He also rewarded the workmen after they completed its first Korean printing in movable type in 1412.²⁰

18 Kwǒn Kǔn, «Yǒnghǔngbu hakkyogi» in Yangch'on munjip (reprint, Seoul, 1969), 14: 8–9b. Han U-gǔn defines sirhak of the early Yi period in «Yijo sirhak üi kaenyōm e taehayō,» Yijo hugi üi sahoe wa sasang (Seoul, 1961), pp. 363–370.

19 Kwǒn Kǔn, Iphak tosōl, pp. 155–163.

20 T'aejong sillok, 22: 47; 24: 17b.

Although the scanty material makes a definite statement impossible, it is reported that the scholar-teacher, as exemplified by Kil Chae, concentrated not only on the «investigation of the classics» (kunggyöng), but also on the practical training of his disciples in Confucian virtues such as filial piety, brotherly love, loyalty, and mutual trust.²¹

Despite Chöng To-jön's warnings that candidates for government service should be chosen primarily on the basis of their proven knowledge of the classical literature,²² the selection of the materials for the civil service examinations remained a controversial topic. Even Kwöñ Kün's position on this issue was ambivalent: although he demanded improvement of the candidates' scholarly achievements, he nevertheless insisted that their literary skills could not be neglected, especially in view of Korea's relations with China.²³ It is clear that the curriculum of the Confucian Academy, despite some attempts at compromise, favored literary training so that its scholastic standing gradually deteriorated.²⁴ From early in the dynasty complaints were voiced that the Confucians failed to strive after the Way and instead were using the examinations merely as a road to rank and emolument. Those who deplored the shallowness of «bureaucratic scholarship» (kwanhak) frequently quoted Confucius' disenchanted words: «In old days men studied for the sake of self-improvement; nowadays men study in order to impress other people.»²⁵

During the first century of the new dynasty, neo-Confucian thought was marked by its own inherent ambivalence between its scholarly demands and its political mission. The minds of the Confucian officials were absorbed in building a new state and a new society on Confucian premises. Thus, scholarly efforts became institutionalized to meet the specific requirements of the young dynasty. The Hall of Worthies (Chiphyönjön), founded in 1420 with the assignment of, among other things, exploring China's ancient literature for societal models, was an elite institution that was staffed with the best scholars of the time. The censorial offices, also absorbing considerable talent, stood guard over a nascent Confucian order that was threatened by improper royal behavior, the continued Buddhist 21 Kil Chae's biography in Sejong sillok, 3: 31–32b.

22 Chöng To-jön, Chosön kyönggukchön in Sambong-jip, pp. 227–228.

23 T'aejong sillok, 13: 13b–14.

24 For a discussion of the debate on curricular matters, see Yi Söng-mu, «Sönch'o üi Sönggyun'gwan yön'gu,» The Yöksa Hakpo, 35/36: 242–245 (Dec. 1967).

25 T'aejong sillok, 2:23; Lun-yü, Bk. 14, Chap. 25; Arthur Waley, The Analects of Confucius (London, 1949), p.187.

tradition, and the raw struggle for power by various political groups. Toward the end of the fifteenth century a whole new generation of Confucians, disillusioned by a socio-political order that fell far short of embodying the neo-Confucian ideals, began to protest the loss of the Way and to initiate a restorative movement.

III The Way on a Side-track

From the beginning of the dynasty the establishment of an authoritative «succession of the Way» was an important issue, but the initial attempts to select the proper candidates proved unsuccessful. Kwǒn Kǔn was the first to pay close attention to this problem. Recapitulating the hazardous history of «this Way» (sado) from the decline of the Chou dynasty (1155–256 B.C.) to its recovery in the Sung dynasty, Kwǒn seems to have had no trouble in explaining its transmission to Korea. Although Korea was situated «beyond the sea,» Kija, the second outstanding ruler of ancient Korea, had brought to the peninsula a civilization that in subsequent centuries had been nurtured by close imitation of Chinese institutions. The first person to request the printing of Chu Hsi's version of the Four Books, Kwǒn recalled, was his grandfather, Kwǒn Po (1262–1346), who entrusted his scholarship to his nephew, Yi Che-hyǒn (1287–1367). Thereafter Yi Kok (1328–1396), Yi Che-hyǒn's disciple, imparted his knowledge to his son, Yi Saek, who in turn became the teacher of Chǒng Mong-ju, Yi Sung-in, and Chǒng To-jǒn.²⁶ For Kwǒn Kǔn, this line of transmission had a familial quality, and this may be the reason he did not mention the names of those whom history credits with introducing Chu Hsi's works in Korea, An Hyang (1243–1306) and Paek I-jǒng (?).²⁷

Among the scholars Kwǒn Kǔn enumerated, Chǒng Mong-ju became, partly on Kwǒn's initiative, the subject of considerable attention in the early years of the dynasty. In recognition of his unfailing loyalty and uprightness, T'aejong bestowed upon Chǒng the posthumous name (si) Mun-ch'ung and the posthumous title of chief state councillor.²⁸ Neither Kwǒn's recommendation nor T'aejong's gesture of conciliation had any connection with Chǒng's scholarship. Kwǒn undoubtedly acted out of concern for a disgraced friend; T'aejong could well afford a demonstration 26 Kwǒn Kǔn, «Preface» to Sambong-jip, p. 1.

27 An Hyang was canonized in 1319.

28 T'aejong sillok, 2: 17b; Chōsen shi (Keijō, 1932–1940), 4.1: 269.

of magnanimity. Government propaganda eventually built Chōng up into the prototype of loyal subject (ch'ungsin). The young dynasty could make better use of Chōng's loyalist image than of his scholarship.²⁹ In the long run this mystification was instrumental in elevating Chōng to the exalted position of ancestor of Korean neo-Confucianism.

Kwōn Kūn, the tireless commentator and promoter of his contemporaries, was the first neo-Confucian scholar of the Yi dynasty to be recommended for the highest honor Confucian society could bestow upon its worthies: the enshrinement of the spirit tablet in the Shrine of Confucius (Munmyo). Only ten years after his death, in 1419, a member of the censorial office who had been closely associated with Kwōn told the king that those who acquired merits for scholarship were traditionally remembered by canonization. Kwōn, the memorialist stated, had been deeply learned in neo-Confucianism (sōngni), had authored the Iphak tosōl «to open the door to scholarship for later students,» and had written commentaries to elucidate difficulties earlier Confucians had not clarified. In addition, Kwōn had been known as far as China for his elegant writing style. An edict ordered that the deliberations on this issue should also include other «famous ministers» (myōngsin) such as Ch'oe Ch'ung (984–1068) and Ha Yun (1347–1416).³⁰ The matter rested there and was not taken up again until the mid-1430s. At that time Kwōn was connected with his predecessors, Yi Che-hyōn and Yi Saek. The memorial read that it was through these three men that the «way of Confucius and Mencius» gained followers in Korea.³¹ Twenty years later, in 1456, the great scholar and prominent member of the Hall of Worthies, Yang Sōng-ji (1415–1482), asked for the canonization of Shuang Chi, the Chinese advisor of Koryō's King Kwangjong (r.949–975), Ch'oe Ch'ung, Yi Che-hyōn, Chōng Mong-ju, and Kwōn Kūn for the purpose of «encouraging later generations.»³² The last appeal to honor the «Eastern worthies,» Yi Che-hyōn, Chōng Mong-ju, Yi Saek, and Kwōn Kūn, was made by the influential Im Sa-hong (1445–1506) in 1477. Im had heard news of canonizations in China.³³ His initiative was rejected by King Sōngjong (r.1469–1494) who retorted that 29 Chōng Mong-ju was listed as a loyal subject in the Samgang haengsillo. Kil Chae was also put into this category.

30 Sejong sillok, 5: 2a–b, 28.

31 Sejong sillok, 59: 15–17; 72: 12–13b.

32 Sejo sillok, 3: 27b.

33 Im Sa-hong had received news of the canonization of Ts'ai Ch'en (1167–1230), Chen Te-hsiu, and Hu An-kuo (1074–1138) in 1437.

Yi Saek's sympathies for Buddhism rendered his canonization impossible.³⁴

It is evident that all of these proposals were not connected with each other and were not inspired by the desire to construct a chain of succession to substantiate claims of legitimacy. They were motivated either by personal veneration or by the wish to adopt the trappings of Confucian convention. Although the lists of scholars recommended for a place in the Shrine of Confucius varied little, they were not underpinned by a sense of common cause.

Conspicuous is the absence of Chōng To-jōn's name from any of the mentioned lists. Although T'aejong eventually forgave him his involvement on the wrong side of the dynasty's first succession struggle in 1398, Chōng's works were not published until 1492.³⁵ His political misjudgment apparently brought him scholarly oblivion.

IV The Way in Peril

The turn from the fifteenth to the sixteenth century was marked by events known to history as the literati purges of 1498 and 1504.³⁶ These events erupted in reaction to the increased pressure the censorial offices put on the higher echelons of the officialdom and even on the king himself, and they left an indelible impression on the minds of the Confucians. Although the issues that sparked the purges were not connected with Confucian concerns, the major victims were Confucian scholar-officials of considerable repute. The explanation of this phenomenon, though tied in with institutional change and contemporary politics, may lie in the increasing competition between that segment of the officialdom for which scholarship exhausted itself in the traditional pursuit of literary achievements, and the other, much smaller group of officials that was committed to fulfilling the neo-Confucian vision.

During the reign of King Sōngjong there were clear signs of a Confucian revival. A new generation of officials climbed to higher government posts, the influence of which they wished to use for revitalizing the claim that a state without the Confucian-trained scholar-official (yu) was doomed to failure. «If there is no Confucian official [in the state], the Way (to) has no place to lodge. If the Way has nowhere to lodge, through what could the rule (ch'i) become successful?» These words, voiced by one of the most gifted Confucians of that period, Sōng Hyōn (1439–1504), expressed well the concern of the time. Remembering such eminent works of neo-Confucian learning as Chōng To-jōn's Simgirinon (Discourses on the Mind, the Matter, and the Principle) and Kwōn Kūn's Iphak tosōl, Sōng deplored the fact that in his own time there were only a few scholars who understood the «Learning of the Way» (tohak). For Sōng, the essence of Confucian teaching lay in the simple formula contained in the Ta-hsüeh: «to rectify the mind and to make the will sincere.»³⁷ This was an obligation for both the ruler and the official. The official was to use the «Confucian Way» (yudo) to serve his ruler; the ruler was to use the «Confucian Way» to rule the people.³⁸

34 Sōngjong sillok, 82: 23.

35 Chōsen shi, 4.5: 793.

36 For a full discussion of the literati purges, see Edward W. Wagner, The Literati Purges: Political Conflict in Early Yi Korea (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1974).

This philosophy, as expressed by Sōng Hyōn, was shared by a small circle of men who were active in those offices that were in charge of educational and scholarly matters, primarily the Office of the Royal Lectures (Kyōngyōn), the Confucian Academy, and the Office of the Special Councilors (Hongmun'gwan), an office that was established in 1478 to fulfill advisory functions. King Sōngjong was not indifferent to the appeals, constantly repeated by his teachers and advisors, to concentrate on self-cultivation for the benefit of the state. In 1477 he lavishly rewarded the renowned official, Yi Sōk-hyōng (1415–1477), who presented the king with a shortened version of Chen Te-hsiu's Ta-hsüeh yen-i, the Taehak yōnūi chibyo (Essentials of the Extended Meaning of the Great Learning), in which he supplied examples from Koryō history. Yi's work, however, was criticized as being sacrilegious and was not printed.³⁹ Largely as a result of royal docility during Sōngjong's reign, the stage was set for the climactic confrontation between Sōngjong's successor, Yōnsangun (r.1494–1506), and the censorial offices, a confrontation that resulted in the literati purges of 1498 and 1504.⁴⁰

37 These are the translations of Wing-Tsit Chan, A Source Book in Chinese Philosophy (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1963). p. 86.

38 Sōngjong sillok, 104: 10b; Sōng Hyōn, Hōbaektang-jip (date uncertain), 11: 73–74b.

39 Sōngjong sillok, 17: 4b–5; 43: 9a–b; 76: 3b–4b.

40 For a discussion of the increased role of the Royal Lecture, see You-Ung Kwōn, «The Royal Lecture of Early Yi Korea, 1,» Journal of Social Sciences and Humanities, 50: 93–104 (Dec. 1979).

Yönsangun's violent outbursts were certainly not a conscious attack aimed at neo-Confucianism as such. That Kim Chong-jik (1431–1492) and his disciples were the major purge victims was largely circumstantial. Kim's followers did constitute an easily identifiable group that could be used as a convenient target.⁴¹ Whatever the political reasons for selecting the victims, the impact of the purges on the Confucian mind of the time was traumatic. The martyrdom of Kim Chong-jik's best-remembered disciple, Kim Koeng-p'il (1454–1504), became symbolic of the predicament confronting the Confucian Way – a predicament, it was thought, that was comparable only to the dark days when the teachings of Chu Hsi and the Ch'eng brothers, Ch'eng I and Ch'eng Hao, were persecuted as heresy (wihak) by the Sung court. The memory of the purges, a contemporary witness remarked, deterred people from pursuing the Way, and anxious fathers and brothers discouraged possible candidates. This acute sense of danger had a rallying effect which came to be expressed in the term «scholars' forest» (sarim). First appearing in the post-purge period, this term denoted those who had laid down their lives for the Way as well as those who were struggling to revive it in the first decades of the sixteenth century. The recognized leader, who provided the restoration movement with ideological and political orientation, was Kim Koeng-p'il's disciple, Cho Kwang-jo (1482–1519).⁴²

41 Yi Su-gön, studying Kim Chong-jik and his disciples, emphasizes the regional ties of the group. See his Yöngnam sarimp'a ūi hyöngsöng (Taegu, 1979), pp. 251–257. In a recent paper, Edward W. Wagner expresses the opinion that the victims of 1498 were «symbolic victims.» If the issue of Kim Il-son's history draft had not arisen, the purge might have focused on a different segment of the officialdom. Wagner's paper is entitled «A Reexamination of the Ruling Class of the Yi Dynasty.» I should like to thank Prof. Wagner for letting me use this unpublished paper which contains many new and thought provoking points.

42 Chungjong sillok, 12: 43b. In this source, dated 1510, the term sarim seems to be used for the first time in the Sillok. Kim Chong-jik's group had earlier been identified as «the party of seniors from Kyöngsang Province» (Kyöngsangdo sönbaedang). Söngjong sillok, 169: 6b. The term sarim, however, does not seem to denote a group sharply defined on the basis of geographical or social origin. Prof. Wagner focuses his attention on this point in his paper on the leadership formation of the Yi dynasty.

V The Way of the Principle: Cho Kwang-jo

What did Cho Kwang-jo and his group (sarim) stand for? It is an unfortunate by-product of the purges that the collected works of the scholars who later came to be regarded as the forerunners of the sarim were either burned as part of the author's punishment, as Kim Chong-jik's were in 1498,⁴³ or destroyed out of fear of implication, as Chöng Yō-ch'ang's (1450–1504) were in the same year.⁴⁴ Kim Koeng-p'il's thought, too, is only preserved in fragments. This partial transmission favored hagiographical embellishment that further obscures the outlines. It can be safely assumed, however, that Cho Kwang-jo well represented the intellectual tenor of the sarim. As a young man he studied under Kim Koeng-p'il, and in the aftermath of the purges he became the eloquent spokesman for sarim concerns.⁴⁵

Cho Kwang-jo and his followers used the terms «school of principle» (ihak), or «school of nature and principle» (sōngni chi hak), to refer to their thinking. These terms, not often used at the beginning of the dynasty, were interchangeable with «school of the Way» (tohak) and designated a full commitment to the Ch'eng-Chu philosophy. The essence of the school of principle, as Cho defined it, is concentration on self-cultivation as an individual act of self-improvement, unmarred by considerations of self-advancement in the world.⁴⁶ The practitioner of such an uncompromising course who «makes the advancement of the Way his personal responsibility» is the scholar (sa). The most perfect personification of the scholar is the worthy (hyōnja) who «knows nothing besides righteousness (i) and principle» and, unperturbed by the external circumstances of success or failure, uses his full energy and willpower on scholarship and on «rectifying the Way» (chōngdo).⁴⁷ There was a natural and direct correlation between the standard of scholarship and the quality of ruling (ch'i). At times when the scholars' spirits are high and their conventions well established, Cho stated, the political climate, too, is healthy and reminiscent of the blissful periods when the legendary Yao and Shun ruled the 43 Wagner, Literati Purges, p. 44.

44 Hong Hŭi, «Chosŏn hagyesa,» in Bunrui shi, vol. 2 of Chōsen shi kōza (Keijō, 1924), p. 99.

45 For Cho Kwang-jo's career, see Wagner, Literati Purges, pp. 80–83.

46 Chungjong sillok, 26: 40b.

47 Cho Kwang-jo, Chōngam-jip (reprint, Seoul, 1959), 4: 8b.

world. On the other hand, the ruler should be able to create the proper milieu for the scholars to come forward to serve the state.⁴⁸

This emphasis on the interdependence of ruler and scholar was not new, but in Cho Kwang-jo's formulation it gained fresh relevance and urgency. After the abrupt end of Yönsangun's disastrous rule, young King Chungjong (r.1506–1544) was constantly reminded of his obligation to use the right scholar-officials to recreate the perfect political order (chich'i) on the pattern of Yao and Shun as expressed in the Ta-hsüeh. The headmaster of the Confucian Academy, Yu Sung-jo (1452–1512), offered the king his own version of the Ta-hsüeh, the Taehak samgang-p'almok cham (Admonitions on the Three Main Points and the Eight Subsidiary Points of the Ta-hsüeh). Yu was motivated to do so by his anxiety that Chungjong might neglect to take the essence of the Ta-hsüeh as the «measuring square and the marking line» for cultivating himself and ruling the country.⁴⁹

Chungjong became the personality upon which the advocates of the school of principle pinned their hope for a general renovation. The visionary zeal which inspired Cho and his group made them critical observers of the contemporary scene. They castigated the low level of scholarship that exhausted itself in the practice of literary styles for the sole purpose of advancement in the government. For a purist of Cho's persuasion, the pursuit of literary arts was marginal and, through its emotional involvement, detrimental to self-cultivation. An examination system that one-sidedly tested literary skills was, in Cho's eyes, neither the right instrument for promoting Confucian studies nor an adequate means of selecting candidates for government service. Cho contrasted the «true Confucian» (chinyu) who really understood the contents of the classics and lived up to them with the «ordinary Confucian» (sogyu) who merely paid lip service to the Confucian cause. Cho demanded that those scholars who preferred to stay away from the examinations should be detected and recruited through a special recommendation examination.⁵⁰

It may well be asked how Cho Kwang-jo's «school of principle» (ihak) differed from Kwöñ Kün's «relevant learning» (sirhak). Both were state-centered, although to a differing degree. Kwöñ was, at the very beginning of the dynasty, committed to building a Confucian state by the practical 48 Chungjong sillok, 29: 16b–17.

49 Yu Sung-jo, «Preface» to Taehak samgang-p'almok cham (reprint, Seoul, 1973), pp. 7–13.

50 Chungjong sillok, 29: 16b–17.

application of Confucian fundamentals. One hundred years later, Cho still aimed at the same goal but, perhaps because of past events, with a lower level of tolerance. In contrast to Kwǒn's concept of self-cultivation as a starting-point for a Confucian political order, Cho's understanding of self-cultivation was more uncompromising. Although the ultimate goal of the Confucian message was for both the secure establishment of a society anchored in Confucian principles, Cho regarded self-cultivation more as an end in itself. He was therefore less tolerant and more idealistic than Kwǒn. He was ready to acknowledge that the day-by-day running of the government was the responsibility of «high ministers,» but only on the condition that they be sincere and public-spirited; if they failed to live up to Cho's high standards of conduct, they had to be subjected to merciless remonstrance. In Cho's eyes self-cultivation could be meaningful even outside the involvement with state affairs. The highest ideal, however, was the simultaneous realization of both.⁵¹

VI The First Links in a Line of Succession

The assurance that the Confucian cause under King Chungjong's tutelage was slowly regaining importance and influence encouraged Cho Kwang-jo and his followers to seek for themselves a heightened standing by asking for the official recognition of those they regarded as their immediate intellectual forebears. They saw themselves as the rightful practitioners of a doctrine that had its antecedents in the early part of the dynasty, and they were looking for reassurance by marking their own place in a firm line of succession.

The debates on the canonization of Chǒng Mong-ju, the famed Koryǒ loyalist, and of such purge victims as Kim Koeng-p'il and Chǒng Yǒ-ch'ang, gained momentum in 1517. Entrenched in strategic posts in the censorial offices, Cho Kwang-jo and his followers renewed in that year the demand, first submitted in 1510, that Chǒng Mong-ju be honored with a permanent place in the Shrine of Confucius. Rather than stressing Chǒng's loyalist image, which had brought him rehabilitation at the beginning of the dynasty, the memorialists now presented Chǒng as the ancestor of Korea's school of principle, a scholar who had received his learning directly from China.⁵² Chǒng's merits in the propagation of Confucian scholarship and rituals and his dedication to the advancement of edu-tional institutions, it was stated, compared with such Chinese neo-Confucian giants as Chou Tun-i and the Ch'eng brothers. Ch'ong's by then almost legendary fame, confirmed by earlier kings, shielded him from the arguments of those government circles which opposed his canonization on the grounds that he had served the fake Sin (i.e. Sin U, r.1374–1388, and Sin Ch'ang, r.1388–1389) at the end of Koryo.⁵³ Moreover, King Chungjong was clearly in favor of giving the cause of the school of principle an official boost by installing Ch'ong in the Shrine of Confucius.⁵⁴ In the fall of 1517 Ch'ong Mong-ju became the first Korean neo-Confucian to be honored with a spirit tablet in the Shrine of Confucius.

51 Cho Kwang-jo, Chǒngam-jip, 3: 1b.

52 Chungjong sillok, 27: 35b, 37.

While Ch'ong Mong-ju's canonization met with little outright opposition, it proved to be much more difficult to shape Kim Koeng-p'il and Ch'ong Yō-ch'ang into proper candidates for the same honor. To be sure, Kim Koeng-p'il combined all the virtues that Cho and his group admired. In the course of recommending «scholars who were spending their lives in hiding» (ǔnil chi sa) for government service, Kim was discovered in 1494 and highly praised for his dedication to the school of principle and his correct behavior.⁵⁵ It was noted that Kim did not make any efforts to enter government service by taking the higher civil service examinations.⁵⁶ His unassuming attitude and scholarly integrity reportedly was inspired by such Confucian classics as the Hsiao-hsüeh (Elementary Learning) and the Ta-hsüeh, the gist of which he found summed up in the brief formula: «to guide men through self-cultivation» (sugi ch'iin).⁵⁷ Although Kim enjoyed high respect even in government circles, he became, through his association with Kim Chong-jik, one of the major victims of the purge of 1504. Kim's martyrdom was heightened by the rather quick rehabilitation the purge victims of 1498 and 1504 were granted by King Chungjong,⁵⁸ but, more importantly, it underscored the tenuous position of the school of principle at the beginning of the sixteenth century.

53 Chungjong sillok, 29: 14a–b, 21b, 31a–b.

54 For Ch'ong Mong-ju's canonization, see Wagner, Literati Purges, pp. 88–92. It could be argued that An Hyang was the first neo-Confucian who was enshrined in the Shrine of Confucius. The neo-Confucians of the early Yi dynasty, however, did not regard him as an important personality in the line of transmission. Yi I, for example, says that An Hyang had no connection with «this Way» (sado). «Kyōngyōn ilgi II» in Yulgok chōnsō (reprint, Seoul, 1971), 29: 12b.

55 Earlier Kim Koeng-p'il had come out against Buddhism. Sōngjong sillok, 118: 13–15.

56 Sōngjong sillok, 290: 39.

57 Yōnsangun ilgi, 31: 4b; Chungjong sillok, 29: 14b.

58 Chungjong sillok, 1: 26b, 31b.

By 1517, Kim Koeng-p'il and Chōng Yō-ch'ang had become the personalities the sarim looked up to as their «ancestral teachers» (chongsa),⁵⁹ and their canonization became a major sarim concern. Their enshrinement, it was memorialized, would uplift the depressed spirit of the scholarly circles and also revitalize the school of principle. Although Kim's personal moral rectitude was not subjected to doubt even in the higher bureaucracy, there were critics who maintained that Kim had not substantially contributed to the elucidation of the classics and who belittled Kim's teaching activities.⁶⁰ In response, Kim's admirers conceded that none of their master's works was transmitted, but countered with the Mencian argument that among the ways through which a superior man effected his teachings, books were not included.⁶¹ Moreover, if Heaven had not brought forth Kim, who would have continued Chōng Mong-ju's heritage? This emotional plea was supported by Cho Kwang-jo, who argued that the undiminished fascination with Kim's personality was proof enough of his worthiness to be enshrined. If people of Kim's and Chōng's calibre had been in office under Yōnsangun, another memorialist claimed, that ruler could not have gone to the excesses he did.⁶² Although King Chungjong was inclined to agree with these arguments, he was continuously cautioned by his highest ministers, and in the end he refused to grant Kim's enshrinement.

The canonization of worthies from among their own ranks was a very serious matter for the sarim. That they included Chōng Mong-ju solely for the purpose of making Kim Koeng-p'il a more acceptable candidate, as the Sillok historians scathingly claimed,⁶³ is, however, open to question. Although the relationship between Kim and Chōng was not yet worked out satisfactorily – the connecting links were still missing – Chōng was a necessary intermediary from a temporal as well as an intellectual point of view. He represented the nascent neo-Confucian tradition of late Koryō and at the same time related Korean Confucianism to the Chinese source, the Ch'eng-Chu school. To underscore Chōng's pivotal position, he was even credited with having compiled a Sasō chipchu (Selected Commentaries to the Four Books) that allegedly followed Chu Hsi's spirit.⁶⁴ Cho

59 Chungjong sillok, 29: 12, 13.

60 Chungjong sillok, 29:16.

61 The Works of Mencius, Bk. 7, Pt. 1, Chap. 40.

62 Chungjong sillok, 29: 16, 22, 31b–32; 32: 67b; 33: 40b–41.

63 Chungjong sillok, 29: 15; Wagner, Literati Purges, pp. 90–91.

64 Chungjong sillok, 30: 42b.

and his adherents pursued the construction of a historical perspective with such intensity that they exposed themselves to the charge of being cliquish.⁶⁵ The effort to place themselves in the course of an ongoing Confucian tradition did not save Cho and his group from a further disastrous setback, the purge of 1519,⁶⁶ but they nevertheless secured for the Way a foundation from which it could take off again some decades later.

VII The Way Reconsidered

The shock of the purge of 1519 was not overcome even toward the end of Chungjong's reign. The fact that a seemingly unforgiving Chungjong was unwilling to close the case by rehabilitating Cho Kwang-jo kept the sarim in suspense. Memorialists agreed that the school of principle had suffered a grave decline and that scholarship had consequently deteriorated to a lamentable degree. More aggressively, they blamed Chungjong for having sacrificed Cho so easily in 1519 and for being reluctant, more than twenty years later, to honor him as an outstanding Confucian. The king, it was demanded, should be as magnanimous toward Cho as Sejong had been toward Ch'ong Mong-ju. The memorialists topped their request with the bold assertion that the literati mores were, after all, an exact indicator of the quality of the «national tradition» (kuksok).⁶⁷ The fate of the sarim had thus grown into a national concern.

Like no other scholar before him, Cho Kwang-jo became the embodiment of the Way and seems to have set the standards by which his predecessors as well as his successors were judged. At mid-century the two towering philosophers who gave Korean neo-Confucianism its permanent shape, Yi Hwang (1501–1570) and Yi I (1536–1584), reviewed the history of the Way in general and Cho Kwang-jo's contribution to it in particular. Analyzing the origin of the «Learning of the Way» (tohak) in Korea, Yi I opined that the emergence of this concept was a clear sign of troubled times when the Way was in decline. The scholars who under such circumstances were «investigating the principle (kungni) and rectifying their hearts (chöngsim),» and who rose to prominence through the Way were easily singled out as a special group and exposed to attacks from 65 Chungjong sillok, 29: 15; Wagner, Literati Purges, p. 91.

66 For a thorough discussion of the 1519 purge, see Wagner, Literati Purges, pp. 70–120.

67 Chungjong sillok, 91: 76; 103: 32b–38; Injong sillok, 1: 63b. For a discussion of the term kuksok, see Deuchler, «Neo-Confucianism.»

those who did not share the same values. For Yi I, the true representative of the Way was the scholar-official who combined learning with an uncompromising government career, a combination of talents Yi found in the person of Cho Kwang-jo.⁶⁸ Yi I's opinion that Cho rose too rapidly in the world before his scholarship was completely matured and therefore eventually met disaster was shared by Yi Hwang. As one of Cho's biographers, Yi Hwang praised Cho's early dedication to the pursuit of the Way and the sincerity with which he took upon himself the task of speaking up for the Way in dangerous times. But, Yi Hwang noted, Cho did not rein in his political activities with the judgment of a fully developed scholar.⁶⁹ Despite these reservations, Yi I and Yi Hwang admired Cho as an unusually gifted scholar whose mission for the Way was terminated too abruptly.

In a sense, Cho Kwang-jo's counterpart was Yi Ōn-jök (1491–1553) whose scholarly contribution to the school of principle was highly acclaimed by both Yi I and Yi Hwang. Yi Ōn-jök's government career epitomized the hazardous position of a Confucian official who became caught up in the dirty play of power politics. In 1545, when once again scholars were sacrificed in a purge, Yi did not forcefully enough defend sarim interests and was even made a merit subject by the newly enthroned King Myōngjong (r.1545–1567). Only a couple of years later, however, Yi was implicated in the so-called wall inscription incident of 1547, and as a consequence the attacks against the sarim were renewed. Yi was sent into exile where, far away from government concerns, he devoted himself to scholarship and wrote a great number of works that inspired later generations of scholars. His most original contribution was the Taejak changgu (Commentary to the Ta-hsüeh). Regretting that the classics of the sages and the commentaries of the worthies were not without deficiencies and obscurities, Yi felt compelled to go beyond Chu Hsi's textual arrangement and to work out his own version,⁷⁰ a willful deviation from established norms that was censured by both Yi Hwang and Yi I.⁷¹ Besides the Taejak changgu, he produced a number of compilatory works and one of the Yi dynasty's first ritual manuals, the Pongsōn chapüi (Various Ceremo-

68 Yi I, «Kyōngyōn ilgi II» in Yulgok chōnsō, 28: 22b, 23–24.

69 Yi Hwang, T'oegye chōnsō (reprint, Seoul, 1971), 5: 34; 48: 28–38 (Biography of Cho Kwang-jo).

70 Yi Ōn-jök, «Preface» to Taejak changgu in Hoejae chōnsō (reprint, Seoul, 1973), p. 553.

71 Yi Hwang, T'oegye chōnsō, 11: 7b–11; Yi I, Yulgok chōnsō, 14: 36–37.

nies Concerning the Veneration of Ancestors).⁷² Whereas Yi Hwang frequently acknowledged his indebtedness to Yi Ōn-jök and considered him one of the great Confucians of his time, Yi I could not forgive him his bad judgment of 1545 and therefore denied him the attribute of «great Confucian» (taeyu).⁷³

Both Cho Kwang-jo and Yi Ōn-jök were defenders of the Way, albeit with different emphasis, and they came to be regarded by their contemporaries and successors as firm links in a philosophical tradition that awaited official recognition.

VIII The Enshrinement of the Five Worthies

The motivation for linking the representatives of a common cause in a coherent line of succession seems to have been inherent in the concept of the Way. At the beginning of the dynasty Kwŏn Kŭn concerned himself with this problem, and toward the end of the sixteenth century the pre-occupation with tracing the orthodox tradition (chōn) and with fixing its main stations grew intense. A major reason for this search for security in official recognition undoubtedly was the memory of the times when the exponents of the Way were threatened with extinction. Another reason, although difficult to document, may have been the ambition of the Korean neo-Confucians to emulate Chu Hsi's authoritative construction of the Chinese line of transmission.⁷⁴

The issue of the rehabilitation of Cho Kwang-jo was revived a few months after King Sōnjo (r.1567–1608) ascended the throne in 1567. The eminent scholar Ki Tae-süng (1527–1572) implored the young king to exercise sounder judgment than his predecessors and to do justice to such superior men as Cho Kwang-jo and Yi Ōn-jök. To support his argument, Ki gave a historical review of precedents, reaching as far back as Chōng Mong-ju.⁷⁵ The aged Yi Hwang seconded Ki's plea by reiterating his praise for both Cho Kwang-jo and Yi Ōn-jök.⁷⁶ Encouraged by the counsel of such outstanding scholars, the king granted Yi Ōn-jök the posthum-

72 Myōngjong sillok, 15: 59a–b.

73 Yi I, Yulgok chōnsō, 28: 23–24. Also see Yi Pyōng-do, «Yi Hoe-jae wa kū hangmun,» Chindan hakpo, 6: 132–147 (Nov. 1936).

74 See Wing-Tsit Chan, «Chu Hsi's Completion of Neo-Confucianism,» pp. 73–81.

75 Sōnjo sillok, 1: 4–5.

76 Sōnjo sillok, 1: 6a–b; 2: 22–23; Wagner, Literati Purges, p. 118.

ous title of chief state councillor early in 1568 and finally, two months later, bestowed the same honor on Cho Kwang-jo.⁷⁷

The case, however, did not rest there. Seizing upon these long-awaited rehabilitations, students of the Confucian Academy immediately requested the canonization of the four worthies (sahyōn), Cho Kwang-jo, Yi Ōn-jōk, Kim Koeng-p'il and Chōng Yō-ch'ang. The king refused such fast action.⁷⁸ The canonization drive nevertheless gained momentum. In the general search for the roots of Korean neo-Confucianism the pedigree of the transmitters of the Way was being fixed in ever greater detail. One of the first to present an uninterrupted line of transmission was Ki Tae-süng. His reconstruction started with Chōng Mong-ju, followed by Kil Chae, Kim Suk-cha (1389–1456), Kim Chong-jik, Kim Koeng-p'il, and Cho Kwang-jo. The most precarious link was certainly that between Chōng Mong-ju and Kil Chae, a relationship which could not be convincingly established, but which was necessary to connect Koryō with the early Yi dynasty. Kil Chae's disciple, Kim Suk-cha, handed the Way to his son and major disciple, Kim Chong-jik, from whom the scholarly lineage was uninterrupted up to Cho Kwang-jo. Kwōn Kūn's name, although mentioned a couple of times, was definitely dropped.⁷⁹

The cause of the Way was strongly supported by Yi Hwang, who in 1568, during his last sojourn in the capital before his death, submitted to Sōnjo a lengthy memorial – one section of which was devoted entirely to the theme of the Way. Drawing on his neo-Confucian wisdom, Yi argued that the Way emerged from the mandate of Heaven (ch'ōnmyōng) and was embodied in human morality. It had reached its apogee when Yao and Shun and the three sage kings (Yü, T'ang, and Wen) were ruling the world. Confucius, his disciples, and Mencius further elucidated the Way, but because they did not attain political office they could only hand their teachings on to later generations. After a long period of eclipse by heterodox teachings (idan), the Way was resurrected by worthies of the Sung time. Finally, at the end of Koryō, the teachings of the Ch'eng-Chu school reached Korea. Although there had been wise rulers at the beginning of the dynasty, the Way in Korea was still endangered by Buddhism and «conventional learning» (soghak). Yi closed his exposition by urging Sōnjo to reestablish the age of Yao and Shun in order to give the Way a perma-

77 Sōnjo sillok, 2: 10b, 12a–b, 13b; Chōsen shi, 4.8: 695.

78 Chōsen shi, 4.8: 699.

79 Sōnjo sillok, 2:27; 3: 33.

inent abode and to set the people's minds straight.⁸⁰ Yi Hwang's memorial had the forceful tone of a political testament and undoubtedly contributed to making the restoration of the Way a central issue of the 1570s.

In the spring of 1570 the students of the Confucian Academy renewed their demand for the enshrinement of the four worthies. The king once more was reluctant to take action.⁸¹ The decision on the matter was difficult because there was no written testimony for evaluating Kim Koeng-p'il's and Chōng Yō-ch'ang's merits. This was the reason even Yi Hwang counseled caution.⁸² A search for works left by Kim, Chōng, and Cho Kwang-jo did not produce much new evidence.⁸³ Encouraged by the Royal Secretariat, however, the king finally ordered the first counselor of the Office of the Special Councilors, the scholar Yu Hŭi-ch'un (1513–1577), to submit the remaining works and the biographies of the four candidates for printing and distribution. Yu's compilation, prefaced by Yi Hu-baek (1520–1578), carried the title Kukcho yusollok (Records on the Confucian Forebears of the Dynasty).⁸⁴ Besides these records, the list of candidates was expanded by adding the name of Yi Hwang, who had died in 1570. This lent the movement additional prestige.⁸⁵

There are several reasons King Sōnjo was so reluctant to take a final decision on the issue. Despite Yu Hŭi-ch'un's efforts, Kim Koeng-p'il and Chōng Yō-ch'ang remained doubtful candidates. Yi I, who was, after the death of Yi Hwang, the most prestigious neo-Confucian thinker of the time, communicated to the king his uneasiness about Kim and Chōng. Yi fully endorsed only the enshrinement of Cho Kwang-jo and Yi Hwang.⁸⁶ Moreover, Yi Ōn-jōk's unorthodox interpretation of the Ta-hsiüeh cast doubt on his candidacy.⁸⁷ Although Yu Hŭi-ch'un also considered the simultaneous canonization of five worthies no easy matter, he tried to encourage Sōnjo by reminding him that the canonization of the five worthies in Sung China (Chou Tun-i, the Ch'eng brothers, Chang Tsai 80 Sōnjo sillok, 2: 20b, 21; Yi Hwang, T'oegye chōnsō, 6: 46b–50. This memorial is called «Mujin yukchosō» (Memorial in Six Sections of 1568).

81 Sōnjo sillok, 4: 1a–b, 2a–b; Yi I, «Kyōngyōn ilgi II» in Yulgok chōnsō, 28: 46b–47, 47b–48.

82 Yi Hwang, «Ōnhaengnok,» T'oegye chōnsō, 5: 34b.

83 Sōnjo sillok, 4: 3b, 4b.

84 Sōnjo sillok, 4: 4b–5, 6b–7, 8b; Sōnjo sujōng sillok, 4: 14b–15; Chōsen tosho kaidai (Keijō, 1932), pp. 357–358.

85 Sōnjo sillok, 8: 16b.

86 Yi I, «Kyōngyōn ilgi II» in Yulgok chōnsō, 29: 12–13; Sōnjo sillok, 7: 57b.

87 Sōnjo sillok, 175: 1b–3b.

(1020–1077), and Chu Hsi) had been an outstanding event that should be repeated in Korea.⁸⁸

After the debate had been interrupted by the Japanese invasions in the 1590s, it gained national significance during the years of reconstruction. The students of the Confucian Academy now presented the issue of canonization as an integral part of national reconstitution. Just as neo-Confucianism had functioned as a bulwark that eventually stopped the southward march of the Chin armies against the Sung, the canonization of the five worthies, the memorialists urged, would now contribute to the revitalization of the Confucian spirit of the country.⁸⁹ A flood of memorials reasoned in the same vein,⁹⁰ and the rebuilding of the war-torn Shrine of Confucius in 1604 was considered by the highest government circles as a proper occasion for celebrating the enshrinement.⁹¹ National consensus finally was reached, but the king shrank from granting his ultimate consent with the worn-out argument that canonization was a grave matter that was difficult to decide.⁹² Sōnjo's successor, Kwanghaegun (r.1608–1623), was put under mounting pressure from the memorialists for more than two years before the enshrinement of the five Korean worthies was granted in the fall of 1610.⁹³

IX The Permanent Shaping of the Way

The enshrinement of the Five Worthies in the Shrine of Confucius ended the long struggle by the defenders of the Way for official recognition. It was a victory for the sarim, whose concerns were no longer confined to a small group but had developed the «right learning» (chōnghak) now accepted by the general officialdom. The term sarim therefore disappeared into oblivion.

From the very beginning of the dynasty, the Way – that is, the philosophical heritage of the Ch'eng-Chu school – had never been endangered by competition from any other Confucian school of thought. Rather, it stood in danger of its totality being destroyed by the separation of its two 88 Sōnjo sillok, 10: 16.

89 Sōnjo sillok, 172: 20b–23, 23–24.

90 Sōnjo sillok, entries throughout 1604.

91 Sōnjo sillok, 180: 9b–12.

92 Sōnjo sillok, 183: 16b–18; 195: 11b–12b; 196: 10; Kwanghaegun ilgi, 1: 98ff.

93 See Kwanghaegun ilgi, kwōn 6, 14, 24–26.

component parts, the Way of scholarship (hakto) and the Way of ruling (ch'ido). Kwǒn Kǔn kept emphasizing that profound learning was a necessary concomitant of wise rulership. But all too easily scholarship was degraded to a mere vehicle to power and thereby was deprived of its moral assignment. Consequently, the quality of government suffered. Cho Kwang-jo tried to redress this imbalance by making the Ta-hsüeh again the measure of the school of principle, insisting that the moral, Confucian-trained official be admitted as the authoritative counselor and critic. In such a lofty position, however, the Confucian worthy (hyōnsa) easily became the target of «small men» (soin) who resented being constantly reminded of their moral deficiencies. Moreover, the worthy was confronted by the ruler who was apt to resist indoctrination as an undue limitation on royal authority. Although Cho Kwang-jo failed to meet this dual challenge successfully, he nevertheless came to symbolize the ideal representative of the Way.

In Korea, scholarship was very closely linked to government service, and it also had to conform to the standards set by the Ch'eng-Chu school that was recognized as state orthodoxy. The final settlement of the line of transmission was not the streamlining of conflicting theses of different schools; rather, it underscored the powerful hold orthodoxy had on the Korean Confucians. This mainstream of thought, carefully banked by the early commitment to the orthodox Way, did not easily absorb new substance in subsequent centuries.

GLOSSARY

An Hyang	安 琦
Bunrui shi	分類史
Chang Tsai	張載
chen-kuan	貞觀
Chen-kuan cheng-yao	貞觀政要
Chen Te-hsiu	真德秀
Ch'eng-Chu	程朱
Ch'eng Hao	程顥
Ch'eng I	程頤
ch'i	治

ch'ido	治道
chich'i	至治
Chin	金
Chindan hakpo	檀道報
chinyu	眞儒
Chiphyōnjōn	賢殿
Cho Kwang-jo	趙光祖
Ch'oe Ch'ung	崔冲
chǒn	傳
Chōng Mong-ju	鄭夢周
Chōng To-jōn	鄭道傳
Chōng To-jōn sasang ūi yōn'gu	思想의研究
Chōng Yō-ch'ang	鄭道昌
Chōngam-jip	鄭靜庵集 chōngdo	正道
chōnghak	正學
Chōngjong	正宗
chongsa	宗師
chōngsim	心命
ch'ōnmyōng	天義
chōrūi	節義
Chōsen shi	朝鮮史
Chōsen shi kōza	朝鮮史講座
Chōsen tosho kaidai	朝鮮史圖解
«Chosōn hagyesa»	朝鮮學藝
Chosōn kyōnggukchōn	朝鮮經國典
Chou	周
Chou Tun-i	周敦頤
Chu Hsi	朱熹
Chungjong	中宗
ch'ungsin	忠臣
Chung-yung	中庸
Ha Yun	河翁
hakto	學道
Ham Chōl-lin	咸傳霖
Han U-gün	韓治勵
Han Yōng-u	韓永愚
Han'guk sasangsa non'go	韓國思想史論叢
Hōbaektang-jip	虛白堂集

Hoejae chōnsō	晦齋全書
Hong Hŭi	洪熹
Hongmun'gwan	弘文館
Hsia	夏
Hsiao-hsüeh	孝學
Hu An-kuo	胡安國
Hu Ping-wen	胡炳文
hyōnja	賢者
hyōnsa	賢士
i	理義
i	異端
idan	理學
ihak	任宗
Im Sa-hong	漢
Injong	圖說
Iphak tosōl	開國功臣
kaeguk kongsin	奇策
Ki Tae-sŭng	大子升
Kija	箕子
Kil Chae	吉再
Kim Chong-jik	金宗直
Kim Koeng-p'il	金濟弼
Kim Ku-yong	金九容
Kim Suk-cha	金叔滋
kongbu	工夫
konghyo	功勳
Kongyang	恭讓
Koryō	高麗
Koryōsa	高麗史
Kukcho yusollok	國朝儒先錄
kuksok	國俗
kunggyōng	窮經
kungni	窮理
Kwanghaegun	光海君
Kwanghaegun ilgi	光海君日記
Kwangjong	光宗
kwanhak	官學
kwōn	卷
Kwōn Kün	權近

Kwŏn Po	權溥
Kwŏn Tōk-chu	權德周
Kyōngsangdo sŏnbaedang	慶尙道先輩黨
Kyōngyōn	經筵
«Kyōngyōn ilgi»	經筵日記
Li Chi	禮記
Lun-yü	論語
«Mujin yukchoso»	戊辰六傳疏
Munch'ung	文忠
Munmyo	文廟
Myōngjong	明宗
myōngsin	名臣
«Önhaengnok»	言行錄
Paek I-jōng	伯頤正
Pak Chong-hong	朴鍾鴻
Pak Sang-ch'ung	朴尚衷
Pak Sō-saeng	朴瑞生
Pongsŏn chapŭi	奉先雜儀
«P'oūn pongsago sō»	圓隱奉使集序
Poūn sōnsaeng-jip	圓隱先生集
Pulssi chappyōn	佛氏雜辨 sa	士
sadaebu	士大夫
sado	斯道
sahyōn	四賢
Sambong-jip	三峯集
Samgang haengsiltō	三絆行實圖
sarim	士林
Sasō chipchu	四書輯註
Sejo	世祖
Sejong	世宗
Shang	商
Shuang Chi	雙翼
Shun	舜
Shushigaku no denrai to sono eikyō ni tsuite	朱子學の傳來とその影響に就て
si	謚
Sillok	實錄
Simgirinon	心氣理論

Sin Ch'ang	辛昌
Sin U	辛禡
sinsim chihak	身心二學
sirhak	實學
soghak	俗學
sogyu	俗儒
soin	小人
«Sōnch'o ūi Sōnggyun'gwan yǒn'gu»	鮮初의成均館研究
Sōng Hyōn	成俱
Sōnggyun'gwan	成均館
sōngni	性理
sōngni chi hak	性理之學
Sōnjo	宣祖
Sōnjo sujōng sillok	宣祖修正實錄
Sōngjong	成宗
Ssu-shu t'ung	四書通
sugi ch'iin	修己治人
Sung	宋
Ta-hsüeh	大學
Ta-hsüeh yen-i	大學衍義
Taehak changgu	大學章句
Taehak samgang-p'almok cham	大學三綱八目箴
Taehak yǒn'ui chibyo	大學衍義輯要
T'aejo	太祖
T'aejong	太宗
taeyu	大儒
T'ai-chi-t'u shuo	太極圖說
T'ang	湯
T'ang T'ai-tsung	唐太宗
tao	道
tao-hsüeh	道學
tao-t'ung	道統
to	道
T'oegye chōnsō	退溪全書
tohak	道學
«Tongbang ihak ūi chorosō ūi Chōng P'oǔn»	東方理學의祖와서의鄭圓隱 tot'ong	道統
Ts'ai Ch'en	蔡沈

ÿnil chisa	隱逸士
Üryu mun'go	乙酉文庫
wanghwa	王化
Wen	文
wihak	偽學
Yang Söng-ji	梁誠子
Yangch'on munjip	陽村文集
Yao	堯
Yaÿn sönsaeng önhaeng sübyu	沿隱先生言行拾遺
Yi	李
Yi Che-yön	齊賢
«Yi Hoejae wa kû hangmun»	李晦齋外工學問
Yi Hu-baek	李後白
Yi Hwang	李滉
Yi I	李珥
Yi Kok	李穀
Yi Ön-jök	李彦迪
Yi Pyöng-do	李丙燾
Yi Saek	李穡
Yi Sök-hyöng	李石亨
Yi Söng-gye	李成桂
Yi Söng-mu	李成茂
Yi Su-gön	李樹健
Yi Sung-in	李崇仁
Yijo hugi üi sahoe wa sasang	李朝後期의社会外思想
«Yijo sirhak üi kaenyöm e taehayö»	李朝實學의概念에대하여
Yöksa Hakpo	歷史學報
«Yöngħüngbu hakkyogi»	永興府掌校記
Yöngnam sarimp'a üi hyöngsöng	嶺南士林派의形成

Yōnsangun	燕山君
Yōnsangun ilgi	燕山君 日記
yu	儒
Yu Hŭi-ch'ŭn	柳希春
Yu Sung-jo	柳崇祖
yudo	儒道
Yulgok chōnsō	栗谷全書
Yun Yong-gyun	尹容均
Yü	禹
Yüan	元