

The Arabic theory of originality and imitation in a new light

Autor(en): Sanni, Amidu

Objektyp: Article

Zeitschrift: Asiatische Studien : Zeitschrift der Schweizerischen
Asiengesellschaft = Études asiatiques : revue de la Société Suisse-Asie

Band (Jahr): 54 (2000)

Heft 3

PDF erstellt am: 21.09.2024

Persistenter Link: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-147505>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Inhalten der Zeitschriften. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern.

Die auf der Plattform e-periodica veröffentlichten Dokumente stehen für nicht-kommerzielle Zwecke in Lehre und Forschung sowie für die private Nutzung frei zur Verfügung. Einzelne Dateien oder Ausdrucke aus diesem Angebot können zusammen mit diesen Nutzungsbedingungen und den korrekten Herkunftsbezeichnungen weitergegeben werden.

Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Die systematische Speicherung von Teilen des elektronischen Angebots auf anderen Servern bedarf ebenfalls des schriftlichen Einverständnisses der Rechteinhaber.

Haftungsausschluss

Alle Angaben erfolgen ohne Gewähr für Vollständigkeit oder Richtigkeit. Es wird keine Haftung übernommen für Schäden durch die Verwendung von Informationen aus diesem Online-Angebot oder durch das Fehlen von Informationen. Dies gilt auch für Inhalte Dritter, die über dieses Angebot zugänglich sind.

THE ARABIC THEORY OF ORIGINALITY AND IMITATION IN A NEW LIGHT¹

Amidu Sanni

I

One of the reasons why Plato (c. 347 B.C.) would like to ban poets from his Ideal Republic was that he considered them as imitators whose descriptions and portrayal of objects are considerably removed from ultimate reality.² This goes to show that interest in the subject of originality and imitation is of high historical value in regard to art in general and literary works in particular. In contemporary scholarship on the Arabic verse, the contributions by Grunebaum, Heinrichs, Brooms, Bonebakker, and Peled remain the most important.³ However, these authors seem to have all but ignored the poets' perspectives or, at least, failed to illustrate their point of view with the thoroughness it deserves. Moreover, the familiar view that a systematic proposition on the subject was achieved at the hands of 'Abd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī (d. 471/

- 1 This paper was originally presented at the 26th German Oriental Society Congress held at Leipzig, Germany, in September 1995. I am grateful to the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation for sponsoring my participation at the Conference.
- 2 See Plato, The Republic, Penguin Classics, Middlesex 1985, part Ten, 421-39.
- 3 See G.E. von Grunebaum, "The Concept of Plagiarism in Arabic Theory", in: Journal of Near Eastern Studies 3 (1944), pp. 234-53; W. Heinrichs, Arabische Dichtung und griechische Poetik, Beirut 1969, 86 ff.; Henri Brooms, "A Historical Review of Imitation in Literature", in: "How does the Middle Eastern literary Taste differ from the European", Studia Orientalia 44 (1972), 1-94; S.A. Bonebakker, "Sariqa Formula, three Chapters from Ḥātimī's Ḥilyat al-muḥāḍara", in: Annali dell'Instituto Orientale di Napoli 46 (1986), 367-89; Mattitiahu Peled, "On the Concept of Literary Influence in Classical Arabic Literary Criticism", in: Israel Oriental Studies, xi (1991), 37-46.

1078) is not only an overestimation of his contribution but also an inaccurate proposition.

In the literary practice of the pre-Islamic period, imitating older practitioners was a matter of routine, indeed the norm. In support may be cited the case of Imru' al-Qays. Although he is generally regarded as the putative father of the Jāhiliyya poets and the pioneer of the qaṣīda scheme, especially its aṭlāl/nasīb motifs, Imru' al-Qays made reference to one Ibn Judhām as his forerunner in the tradition of wailing over ruined encampments. Essentially, the poetic stereotypes of the Arabic literary tradition concerning idioms, concetti and formulae, seem to have been formalised from the chronologically unspecified period before Islam. 'Antara b. Shaddād (d. 22 B.H./600) was already complaining about "the burden of the past",⁴ wondering whether his predecessors had left any room for him to demonstrate his creativity. This sense of frustration, or at least resignation, was eloquently expressed by Ka'b b. Zuhayr (d. 26/645) who stated that his generation was only charting well-trodden paths, repeating what had been said or borrowing from the existing stock.⁵ In other words, the impression, or rather the strong belief, among the pre-Islamic poet was that the only way to demonstrate originality was by imitating the conventional methods in the treatment of the limited stock of themes established by the tradition. The Umayyad literary arena offers a not too different picture; specific authors from the Jāhiliyya bards were selected as models. In support may be cited the following verse by al-Farazdaq:⁶

4 The expression is borrowed from Walter Jackson Bate's title, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet, Cambridge 1970.

5 'Antara: Hal ghādara 'l-shu'arā'u min mutaraddami / am hal 'arafti 'l-dāra ba'da tawahhumi "Had (previous) poets left anything to be supplemented (lit. mended) / or did you recognize the abode only after groping?", Sharḥ Dīwān 'Antara Ibn Shaddād, ed. 'Abd al-Mun'im 'Abd al-Ra'ūf, Cairo 1958 (?), 142. – Ka'b: Mā arānā naqūlu illā mu'āran / aw mu'ādan min lafẓinā makrūrā "I do not see us saying other than the borrowed / the oft repeated in our speech", Sharḥ Dīwān Ka'b b. Zuhayr – li-'l-Ḥasan Ibn Ḥusayn al-Sukkarī, Cairo 1950, 154.

6 See Sharḥ Dīwān al-Farazdaq, ed. Īliyā al-Ḥawī, Beirut 1983, ii, 323.

Wahaba 'l-Nawābighu liya 'l-qaṣā'ida idh maḍaw wa-Abū Yazīdin wa-dhū 'l-Qurūhi wa-Jarwalu.

“The Nawābighs (i.e. al-Dhubayānī and al-Ja‘dī) endowed me with poetry as they passed away so did Abū Yazīd (al-Mukhabbal al-Sa‘dī), the man with skin ulcers (Imru’ al-Qays), and Jarwal (al-Ḥuṭay’a).”

Further evidence of this relationship is also provided by al-Farazdaq. He likened poetry to a slaughtered huge camel, the main and important parts of which had been consumed by the ancients, leaving behind only the forearms, the intestines and the dregs for the later generation to share.⁷ The anecdote illustrates very vividly the view of the Umayyad’s poet vis-à-vis his predecessors. He considered himself as “a dwarf perched upon the shoulders of giants”, to borrow from Bernard of Chartres, the 12th-century humanist.⁸ In other words, the general feeling in the literary tradition of the Umayyad era was that all original ideas, all expressions of value, and indeed the pool of poetry had been exhausted.

Although the ‘Abbāsīd poet still recognised the patriarchal role of the Jāhiliyya forerunners, he was willing to demonstrate his individuality and creativity by exploring and using such aspects of poetic technique as are dimly utilized in the preceding traditions. He was willing to show that precedence or lateness in chronological appearance has nothing to do with aesthetic efficiency and was prepared to imitate only specific features from the inherited literary corpora. Thus we see Bashshār b. Burd (d. 167/784), the father of the so-called muḥdathūn poets, setting himself the target of producing a tashbīh expression that would rival a particular one by Imru’ al-Qays, which is generally acclaimed as a model.⁹ Some of the poets belonging in this period even 7 Al-Marzubānī, al-Muwashshah, Cairo 1343/1925, 363.

8 Quoted in John of Salisbury’s (d. 1180) Metalogicon, ed. C.C.J. Webb, Oxford 1929, iii, 136.

9 Aghānī, Dār al-kutub ed., Cairo 1927-74, iii, 142, 196; al-Ḥātimī, Ḥilyat al-muḥādara, ed. Ja‘far al-Kattānī, Baghdad 1979, i, 170; Ibn Abī ‘Awn, Kitāb al-Tashbīhāt, ed. Muḥammad ‘Abd al-Mun‘im Khān, Cambridge 1950, 152-53; went as far as challenging the propriety of some of the thematic stereotypes that had assumed the status of established conventions. For example, Abū Nuwās (d. 198/814) waged a sustained, albeit unsuccessful, campaign against the aṭlāl motifs, and was followed much later in this tradition by al-Mutanabbī (d. 354/965) who found the convention of treating nasīb motifs as a prelude to the qaṣīda rather distasteful, if not altogether oppressive.¹⁰ However, the most illustrious advocate for the recognition of the muḥdathūn poetry as an original contribution rather than a parodied variation of the tradition was Abū Tammām (d. 231/845). In his view, the pool of poetry is inexhaustible, and poetry is like clouds of rain that will forever come in succession.¹¹ The muḥdath poet preferred to look within his own generation for models and to be inspired only by the great authors of his time. An anecdote involving Abū Tammām will offer a clearer illustration of the new view of the muḥdathūn poets concerning the concept of originality and imitation. A guest was surprised to see Abū Tammām placing the works of Abū Nuwās and Muslim b. Walīd (d. 208/823) before himself while he was working on a poem. Abū Tammām confirmed to his bewildered guest that he had in fact been “worshipping” the works of the two great poets for some thirty years.¹² The statement reveals the extent of his com-

Ibn Sinān al-Khafājī, Sirr al-faṣāḥa, ed. ‘Abd al-Muta‘ālī al-Ṣa‘īdī, Cairo 1953, 292-93. See also Ibn Wakī‘, al-Munṣif fī naqd al-shī‘r, ed. Muḥammad Riḍwān al-Dāya, Damascus 1982, i, 50-51; Ibn Rashīq, Qurāḍat al-dhahab, ed. Chedly Bouyahia, Tunis 1972, 24-25.

10 See Ewald Wagner (ed.), Der Dīwān des Abū Nuwās, Stuttgart 1988, iii, especially ode 215, p. 247; ode 217, p. 250; ode 219, p. 252; ode 231, p. 265-69. See also Dīwān Abī al-Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbī bi-Sharḥ Abī ‘l-Baqā’ al-‘Ukbarī, ed. Muṣṭafā al-Saqā et al., Cairo 1956, iii, 350.

11 See Sharḥ al-Ṣūlī li-Dīwān Abī Tammām, ed. Khalaf Rashīd Nu‘mān, Baghdad 1977, i, 286-87, 516-17. See similar sentiments as expressed in the poets work in, al-Khālidiyyān, al-Ashbāh wa-‘l-nazā‘ir, ed. Muḥammad Yūsuf, Cairo 1958, i, 2; Ibn Rashīq, al-‘Umda, ed. M.M. ‘Abd al-Ḥamīd, Cairo 1963, i, 91. See also Ḥātimī, al-Risāla al-Ḥātimiyya, q.v. in al-‘Amīdī, al-Ibāna ‘an sariqāt al-Mutanabbī, ed. Ibrāhīm al-Dasūqī al-Bisāṭī, Cairo 1969, 287; al-Ṣūlī, Akhbār Abī Tammām, ed. Khalīl M. ‘Asākir et al., Beirut u.d., 54.

12 Al-Ṣūlī, Akhbār Abī Tammām, 173.

mitment to the literary productions of his own age rather than those of the classical period. Al-Buḥturī (d. 284/897) equally acknowledged modelling his works on those of Abū Tammām rather than that of any ancient author.¹³ Thus the ‘Abbāsīd poet who found himself struggling against “chronological primitivism” of the philologists, to borrow from Grunebaum,¹⁴ now sought to establish his creativity and originality not by following the antiquated models without investigation, but rather, by looking within his own generation as well as by developing, or perhaps making a telling use of, those poetic techniques that were hitherto used with remarkable moderation.

II

In the literary seances and assemblies of the medieval Islamic culture, identification of the originator and the imitator concerning poetical expressions and motifs was a favourite topic, as can be gleaned from a report in al-Aghānī concerning Ḥammād al-Rāwīya (d. 155/771) and certain poets at the court of al-Walīd b. Yazīd (d. 126/744).¹⁵ But the earliest reference to originality and imitation as a theoretical concept was probably made by Ibn Sallām al-Jumāhī (d. 230/845). According to him, Imru’ al-Qays earned the leadership of the Jāhiliyya class of poets not by saying what had never been said, but because he invented (ibtada’a) such techniques that later poets would follow (ittaba’a) out of admiration.¹⁶ But Ibn Sallām fails to develop this further as a proposition that can be applied in a more comprehensive manner to the Arabic verse. Nevertheless, his use of the words signifying invention and imitation within a given historical period, namely, the Jāhiliyya, indicates his sense of theoretical rigour in an analytical tradition that was just evolving. The subject of imitation and originality was often discussed in the literary scholarship within the context of stylistic and 13 Idem, Akḥbār al-Buḥturī, ed. Ṣāliḥ al-Ashtar, Damascus 1958, 59-60.

14 G.E. von Grunebaum, “The Concept of Plagiarism”, 234-53.

15 Aghānī, vi, 71-72; xiv, 17-18.

16 Ibn Sallām al-Jumāhī, Ṭabaqāt fuḥūl al-shu‘arā’, ed. Maḥmūd Muḥammad Shākir, Cairo 1952, 46.

thematic borrowings, and the Kitāb Sariqāt al-shu‘arā’ by Ibn Ṭayfūr (d. 280/893) was one of the earliest efforts on the subject. Although the work seems not to have survived for long, its fragmentary bequests that were available to authors of the following generation provide evidence of a tendency towards a model of analysis that was less than methodical. To this I intend to return later. However, it did not take long before a new dimension to the subject crystallized into a systematic pattern of discussion: the rhetorical tropes are illustrated in a chronological setting of the literary culture with the underlining sense that the younger authors were only imitating the older models. For this we are beholden to Ibn al-Mu‘tazz (d. 296/908). The principal motivation for his Kitāb al-Badī‘ was to show that the rhetorical artifices in the excessive use of which the new poets had indulged were not invented by them.¹⁷ This undoubtedly contains veiled insinuation that the new poets were only imitating an existing tradition and treading a familiar path. It is however ironical that Ibn al-Mu‘tazz could not go further to use his analysis and illustrations as a basis for an articulate theory on the subject of imitation and originality. The Kitāb al-Tashbīhāt (the Book of Similes) by Ibn Abī ‘Awn (d. 322/ 934) which illustrates the various types of similes found in the works of both the ancients and the moderns, has an implicit tendency towards demonstrating which particular simile was borrowed from another, but nowhere did the author employ this as an instrument for formulating a concrete proposition on originality and imitation.

But whether we regard the badī‘ poetry in the positive sense as new-fangled or fantastic, or in the negative sense as corrupted (assuming that it is related to bid‘a), it is obviously from its unfamiliar character which bordered almost on the grotesque that some of the critics were inclined to concede radical originality to its exponents, as did al-Ṣūlī (d. 336/947) when he said:

Know – may God ennoble you – that the idioms of the muḥdathūn (modern) poets from the time of Bashshār up to this time of ours had indeed progressed to express more fascinating motifs, more readily comprehensible expressions, and a discourse with a finer texture, although precedence still belongs to the ancients by virtue of their invention and introduction (of those ideas), naturalness, and self-sufficiency. However, they (the ancients) did not see what the muḥdathūn physically saw and used as objects of comparison, just as the muḥdathūn did not see what they (the ancients) saw and physically experienced... In the former case, the ancients are no match to the moderns, while in the latter case the moderns are below the ancients. Moreover, the moderns sail only with the wind of the ancients, mould on their established forms, draw on their pool, and utilize their discourse material. Hardly would any of them (that is, the moderns) borrow a ma'nā (poetical idea) from the ancients without him improving upon it. We have indeed found in the poetry of these (moderns) such ma'ānī that the ancients never expressed, and such other ideas to which the ancients only alluded but are explicitly and brilliantly expressed by these (moderns). This notwithstanding, their poetry is more in tune with the time, and is more frequently quoted by people at their seances, works, citations and needs.¹⁸

17 Ibn al-Mu‘tazz, Kitāb al-Badī‘, ed. I. Kratchkovsky, London 1935, Arabic text, p. 1.

From the foregoing, it is abundantly clear that the literary legislators and connoisseurs of the post-Classical period were willing to accord priority to the ancients largely from their chronological precedence and on the basis of the fact that the ancients introduced such poetical themes and structural schemata that later poets would follow, otherwise, the ability of the new poets to express old ideas in new forms was taken as an evidence of their originality for which they should be recognized.

The significance of K. Sariqāt al-shu'arā' by Ibn Ṭayfūr was mentioned above. The work may not have survived, but it was most probably available to al-Ḥātimī (d. 338/998), if a long quotation by him from Ibn Ṭayfūr is anything to go by. In any case, the effort of Ibn Ṭayfūr can justifiably be regarded as the first analytical discussion of the issue of imitation and originality in Arabic theoretical discourse. Moreover, the reference by Ibn Ṭayfūr to the Aristotelian concept of artistic imitation as an instrument of good style indicates very clearly that the utilization of Hellenic theoretical principles in the Arabic theoretical lore is somewhat earlier than has hitherto been proposed.¹⁹ The synthesis of Ibn Ṭayfūr's proposition is that the Arabic literary tradition is a remorselessly continuous inter- and intra-textual event. The notion of originality through the instrument of imitation is clearly established by Ibn Tayfūr, although he falls short of prescribing the modality for this.²⁰ This was provided by Ibn Ṭabāṭabā (d. 322/934). According to him, the necessary tools (adawāt) required in poetic practice consist in a sound knowledge of the classical poetic types and the ability to model on them. Our author refers to another work by him, namely, his Tahdhīb al-ṭab' (Refinement of Talent/Nature), which contains selections from authoritative poets, an accessus of some sort, as well as guide-lines to the prospective poet on how to imitate outstanding productions from the classics and generate new conceits. The new poet is advised to imitate only the good aspects in the works of his predecessors and to resist the temptation of making reckless use of the poetic licenses, which dispensation is found with remarkable frequency in the classical corpus. According to him, imitation does not consist in replacing the wording or metre of a given exemplar; rather, using the hooks and eyes of memory the new poet must stock in his mind the sublime thought and expressions of his forerunners and then allow these to macerate in the deep well of his unconscious cerebration. Only after he having successfully achieved this he should go on to express in his own peculiar style whatever poetic thought occurs to him. His own production would then come out like a composite of various metals that nonetheless bears the distinctive stamp of its new producer. According to him, it is this distinctiveness that would qualify the new product to be considered an original work, regardless of any affinities it may share with the original models that inspired it.²¹

18 Al-Ṣūlī, Akhbār Abī Tammām, 16-17. Cf. al-Mubarrad, al-Kāmil, ed. Muḥammad Abū 'l-Faḍl Ibrāhīm & al-Sayyid al-Shaḥḥāta, Cairo 1956, ii, 1; al-Khālidiyyān, al-Ashbāh wa-'l-nazā'ir, i, 171. See also Andras Hamori, "Rhetoric" [Arabic], in Dictionary of the Middle Ages, ed. Joseph R. Strayer, New York 1982 f., x, 345-47.

Successors to Ibn Ṭabāṭabā elaborated on his model of analysis, usually with extensive examples on how imitation can be employed as an instrument for the achievement of originality, and interest in the subject promoted it to a standard topic in works of rhetoric and stylistics.²² In this regard may be mentioned al-Ḥātimī's extensive analysis of it under the broad title al-Sariqāt wa-'l-muḥādhāt (Thievings and Imitation).²³ Abū Hilāl al-ʿAskarī (d. 396/1005)²⁴ and Ibn Rashīq (d. 457/1064) are other later contributors to the discussion.²⁵ Nevertheless, Ibn Rashīq's fine distinction at the levels of phraseology and thought content is noteworthy: he applies the term ibdāʿ to lafẓ "wording", that is, the presentation of a sublime motif in an unusual but fascinating garb, and ikhtirāʿ to maʿnā "poetic idea", that is, the creation of unfamiliar conceits (maʿānī), or injecting familiar motifs with elements hitherto lacking in them. It is significant to note that, in the latter characterization, he was prominently anticipated by al-ʿAskarī.²⁶ Other noteworthy contributors were al-Sharīf al-Raḍī (d. 406/1015),²⁷ and ʿAlī Ibn Khalaf al-Kātib (floruit 5th/11th) in his Mawādd al-bayān.²⁸ One scholar with whom I like to conclude this investigation is ʿAbd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī (d. 471/1078), not least because of his strange, and perhaps confusing, presentation of the traditional view about the concept of imitation. According to him, the notion of imagination as held by poets and ahl al-ʿilm bi-'l-shiʿr (those knowledgeable in poetry) is simply that of conscious substitution of wording and adoption of the familiar mould (uslūb) in the process of composition (naẓm). Illustrating this interpretation of the concept of imitation, al-Jurjānī provides the following examples.

19 See, e.g., G.J.H. van Gelder, Beyond the Line, Leiden 1982, 4.

20 Hilya, ii, 28.

21 Ibn Ṭabāṭabā, Iyār al-shi'r, ed. Ṭāhā al-Hājirī & Muḥammad Zaghlūl Sallām, Cairo 1956, 4-10.

22 See, e.g., Heinrichs, Arabische Dichtung, 86 ff.

23 Ḥilya, ii, 28-92.

24 Kitāb al-Ṣināʿatayn, ed. ʿAlī Muḥammad al-Bijāwī & Muḥammad Abū 'l-Faḍl Ibrāhīm, Cairo 1952, 196-238 (p. 237).

25 al-ʿUmda, ii, 280-93.

26 al-Ṣināʿatayn, 69.

27 Rasāʾil al-Ṣābī wa-'l-Sharīf al-Raḍī, ed. Muḥammad Yūsuf Najm, Kuwait 1961, 82-93 (p. 88).

28 Ed. Fuat Sezgin, Frankfurt 1986, 275-322.

Al-Farazdaq:

a-tarjū Rabī'un an tajī'a ṣighāruhā

bi-khayrin wa-qad a'yā Rabī'an kabīruhā

“Does the Rabī'a (tribe) hope that her young ones would do any good, while Rabia had already weakened her old ones?”

al-Ba'īth:

a-tarjū Kulaybun an yajī'a ḥadīthuhā

bi-khayrin wa-qad a'yā Kulayban qadīmuhā

“Does the Kulayb (tribe) hope that her new ones would do any goods while Kulayb had already weakened her old ones?”

Al-Jurjānī instanced al-Ba'īth's verse as an imitation of the prototype that was provided by al-Farazdaq. According to him, the literary connoisseurs would not consider a poet as imitating unless when rendition would be characterized as having borrowed or stolen from the antecedent.²⁹ I am not aware of any poet or critic before al-Jurjānī who had cited the examples given here as an illustration of artistic imitation. In fact, al-ʿAskarī characterizes the line from al-Ba'īth as an instance of artless borrowing (qubḥ al-akhdh) that must be avoided.³⁰ The kind of disingenuous and mere substitution words demonstrated in the example from al-Ba'īth could not have been tolerated when borrowings with far less obvious infraction had provoked negative reactions and were even regarded as brazen acts of plagiarism. What al-Jurjānī has actually done is to misread the tradition, employing the instrument of what Bloomes calls tessera, to promote whatever quality his own interpretation of the concept might have.³¹ His attempt to create another level at which imitation and originality should be sought, namely, that of ṣūra (cast/model) which is realisable through the instrument of naẓm/tartīb (sentence structure), is an imposition of a model of discourse which he had applied in the discussion of the principle of the inimitability of the Qurʾān. His proposition in this regard is therefore, to say the least, a good case of laboured pedantry. Moreover, his classification of motifs into takhyīlī (imaginative) and ʿaqlī (commonsensical) where only the former is open to borrowing, hence vulnerable to the felony of plagiarism, is by no means a new proposition. His elder kinsman, ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Azīz al-Jurjānī (d. 392/1001) had anticipated him in this point in a way that is innocent of the abstruse classification and pedantic subtleties with which we have to deal in ʿAbd al-Qāhir.³² Therefore, any attempt to attribute too much value to the contribution by ʿAbd al-Qāhir to the subject of originality and imitation, as Peled may have unconsciously done,³³ is interpretable as an overblowing of al-Jurjānī's analytical ingenuity which is admittedly reflected at some other levels of the intellectual discourse.

29 Al-Jurjānī, Dalā'il al-ijāz, ed. Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā, Cairo 1366 A.H., 361-62. The same view is found in al-Qazwīnī (d. 739/1338), see Shurūḥ al-talkhīṣ, Cairo 1318 A.H., iv, 506-7. Cf. Sharḥ Dīwān al-Ḥamāsa li-'l-Marzūqī, ed. Aḥmad Amīn & ʿAbd al-Salām Hārūn, Cairo 1952, iii, 1479. For the illustration from al-Farazdaq, see Dīwān al-Farazdaq, Beirut 1960, 272.

30 Ṣinā'atayn, 230.

31 See Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence, Oxford 1973, 14.

In this study, I have tried to illustrate the various understandings of the concept of imitation and originality in the chronological continuum of Arabic theoretical and literary discourse. The irresistible charm and appeal of the muḥdathūn poetry earned its exponents the tag of radical originality. The reactions of the literary achorns which found the first theoretical response in Ibn Ṭayfūr indicate an early utilization or at least a recognition, of Aristotelian ideas in the Arabic theoretical locution. The so called intertextual theory, which some modern scholars are trying to apply to the Arabic verse, often in a less than cautious fashion in their effort at placing verbal and thematic correspondences within a scientific context,³⁴ was in fact known to Ibn Tayfūr, and his theoretical formulation apparently derived from his recognition of it. One significant point on which I would like to conclude is the emergence of a new validity in the discussion about originality and imitation. The question of whether the door of ijtihād had been closed or not was a major topic in the medieval juridical scholarly tradition. A similar line of argument was found in the literary arena so much that we see Ibn al-Athīr (d. 637/1239) proclaiming with all seriousness on behalf of literary practitioners that “... bāb al-ibtidā’ li-’l-ma’ānī maftūḥun ilā yawmi ’l-qiyāma” (The door to the generation of new ideas is open till the Day of Resurrection).³⁵ Was it the udabā’ (men of letters) that influenced the fuqahā’ (jurists) or was it the other way round regarding the emergence of this new trend, is a question to which a definitive answer cannot be provided in the present investigation. But pursuing it further might offer some useful insights into the cross currents of the medieval theoretical exertions.

32 See ʿAlī b. ʿAbd al-Azīz al-Jurjānī, al-Wasāʾta, ed. Muḥammad Abū 'l-Faḍl Ibrāhīm & ʿAlī Muḥammad al-Bijāwī, Cairo 1966, 183-88. Cf. al-Jurjānī, Asrār al-balāgha, ed. H. Ritter, Istanbul 1954, 313-16.

33 Mattitiah Peled, "On the Concept of Literary Influence", 40-45.

34 E.g. Michael Zwettler, "The Poetics of Allusion in Abū l-ʿAtāhiya's Ode in Praise of al-Hādī", in Edebiyāt, N.S., iii, no. 1 (1989), 1-29.

35 Ibn al-Athīr, al-Mathal al-sā’ir, ed. Aḥmad al-Ḥūfī & Badawī Ṭubāna, Cairo 1959-63, iii, 219.