

Zeitschrift: Asiatische Studien : Zeitschrift der Schweizerischen Asiengesellschaft = Études asiatiques : revue de la Société Suisse-Asie

Herausgeber: Schweizerische Asiengesellschaft

Band: 57 (2003)

Heft: 1

Artikel: Rejoinder : Madhva's unknown sources

Autor: Mesquita, Roque

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-147599>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist die Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften auf E-Periodica. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Zeitschriften und ist nicht verantwortlich für deren Inhalte. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern beziehungsweise den externen Rechteinhabern. Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen sowie auf Social Media-Kanälen oder Webseiten ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Mehr erfahren

Conditions d'utilisation

L'ETH Library est le fournisseur des revues numérisées. Elle ne détient aucun droit d'auteur sur les revues et n'est pas responsable de leur contenu. En règle générale, les droits sont détenus par les éditeurs ou les détenteurs de droits externes. La reproduction d'images dans des publications imprimées ou en ligne ainsi que sur des canaux de médias sociaux ou des sites web n'est autorisée qu'avec l'accord préalable des détenteurs des droits. En savoir plus

Terms of use

The ETH Library is the provider of the digitised journals. It does not own any copyrights to the journals and is not responsible for their content. The rights usually lie with the publishers or the external rights holders. Publishing images in print and online publications, as well as on social media channels or websites, is only permitted with the prior consent of the rights holders. Find out more

Download PDF: 23.03.2026

ETH-Bibliothek Zürich, E-Periodica, <https://www.e-periodica.ch>

REJOINDER: MADHVA'S UNKNOWN SOURCES

Roque Mesquita, University of Vienna

My monograph on Madhva's Unknown Sources, originally published in German (1997) and since 2000 also available in English,¹ has met with a very favourable reception. The many letters of appreciation I have received, and the six book-reviews which have appeared to date in different Indological Journals praise the work as being a fascinating study, seriously and carefully carried out and as one which is completely convincing.² The review of Sharma published in the present issue of this journal, however, does not belong to that category. Not only is the tone of its language different from that of the other six reviews, the way he evaluates the study deviates sharply. Sharma denounces the monograph without hesitation as monumentally incomplete, and as containing several factual errors. He also criticizes the previous favourable reviews of my monograph, claiming 'they miss serious problems in the text reviewed' [cf.1].

The reason why Sharma passes this adverse judgement on my book is his selective and biased reading of the methodological reasoning advanced therein from different angles. As a matter of fact, Sharma's critical remarks deal primarily with the first chapter of my monograph: "Madhva and his Critics" [cf. 5]. The following chapters: "Theological Foundation of Avatāra-Claim" and "Madhva as a Viṣṇu empowered author of all Canonical Texts", are mentioned only in passing [cf. 1]. The subsequent chapter: "Redactional Criteria for the Authorship of Madhva" is not referred to at all (!), although this chapter along with the previous two form the core of my argumentation. For this reason, the assessment of Madhva's unknown sources—attempted by Sharma—[cf. 2-4] which does not examine their essential connection with the Avatāra-claim of

- 1 Roque Mesquita: Madhva's Unknown Sources. Some Observations. Aditya Prakashan, New Delhi: 2000 (Trans. of the original German monograph: Madhva und seine unbekanntes literarischen Quellen. Einige Beobachtungen. [Publications of the De Nobili Research Library XXIV]. Wien: 1997).
- 2 See K.K. Raja (Adyar Library Bulletin 61 [1997: 261]); G. Bühnemann (Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 61/2 [1998: 408-409]); J.W. De Jong (Indo-Iranian Journal 42 [1999: 63-64]); Oskar von Hinüber (Orientalische Literaturzeitung 95/2 [2000: 206]); Jan E.M. Houben (Asiatische Studien 54/2 [2000: 463-468]); E. Franco (Vienna Journal of South Asian Studies 44 [2000: 236-237]).

Madhva and fails to take into consideration the redactional criteria for his authorship is not only superficial but extremely arbitrary. The overall impression is that Sharma avoids discussing the main issues in my monograph and is satisfied to deal with sideline subjects under the pretext that he does not want to discuss the issues in full detail, as I shall try to show below.

The main issue discussed by Sharma is the fictitious sources. This is the longest section in his review. He brings together materials collected by himself and by other scholars [cf. 7] on the old genuine texts quoted by Madhva as well as by other ancient authors. An unbiased scrutiny of this collection reveals that it is only independent evidence for the fact that these texts really existed. In no way can this collection prove that the quotes attributed by Madhva to these texts are also genuine unless Madhva's quotes can be identified in the works of other ancient authors. Not in a single case does Sharma produce a bit of evidence. Nor could he identify similar passages quoted by ancient authors in the works of Madhva. And the assumption that some manuscripts of old texts which are reported to be existent but are not available may provide evidence for the veracity of Madhva's quotations in the near future is nothing but guess work, or wishful thinking at best.³

In short: There is no collateral evidence whatsoever that the text passages attributed by Madhva to the ancient and lost texts are genuine. And the collateral evidence collected by Sharma is valid only for proving the existence of some old text titles mentioned by Madhva in connection with his quotations. Curiously, Sharma mixes up these facts.⁴ Consequently, his entire argumentation is based

3 As an illustration of this 'imaginary veracity' of the untraceable quotations "giving Madhva the benefit of the doubt, at this distance of time", as Sharma postulates in his latest publication (2001:7; 23), I can point out Vyāsaśmṛti, see below n. 36.

I take this opportunity to thank Prof. Sharma for sending me a complimentary copy of his recent pamphlet titled "My latest four Research Papers" (Mumbai 2001 [available also at <http://www.dvaita.net/pdf/papers/four.pdf>]), which reached me when I was about to complete this rejoinder. The first paper bears the title: "Brahmatarka and other unknown source Books of Madhva". Some issues raised again here have been already discussed in my rejoinder. In this pamphlet too Sharma conspicuously avoids addressing the key issues of my monograph. But he raises a set of new objections against my book which are based on misquotations and misinterpretations, and makes many arbitrary accusations phrased in an arrogant and rude tone, unusual in serious scholarly discourse. An unbiased reader will take note of it not without some embarrassment; see below n. 4; 15 and 42.

4 In (2001:12-15) too, Sharma makes a similar mess out of the old text titles belonging to Pañcarātrasaṃhitās, declaring triumphantly: "Prof. Mesquita's effort to condemn Madhva on both the fronts of B.T. and P.R. Saṃhitās has definitely misfired. He should now have on hetvābhāsa, from which general conclusions are drawn [cf. 4]: “Given the evidence we have cited for the veracity of the sources [sic!], his [Mesquita’s] arguments have no basis and may be summarily discarded.”

It is therefore not surprising that Sharma fails to mention that Madhva also quotes from a large number of sources which were unknown not only to his predecessors but also to his contemporaries, and even to his own pupils—an observation made by other scholars too, such as Siauve.⁵ And all these sources, whether they bear well-known titles of old texts or completely unknown titles, have something in common, namely that they are always adduced as additional evidence for the original doctrine put forward by Madhva. I have discussed this matter not only in connection with the two genuine text titles Paiṅgiśruti and Bhāllaveyaśruti,⁶ but also throughout the monograph, as well as in my latest publication on Madhva.⁷ Sharma’s following remark is therefore erroneous: “Mesquita calls a Śruti text of Madhva with the label Paiṅgi [and Bhāllaveya] unknown, following Appayadīkṣita.” [cf. 2.1. and 2.2.]. Since no serious scholar denies that Madhva refers to some old text titles, one could say that the whole effort to collect material on old lost Vedic sources produced nothing more than siddhasādhana—evidence!

Taking all of these points into consideration, we can say that the lacunae in the quotations of Madhva are not confined to a few excerpts (these kind of lacunae are also to be found in the works of other Vedānta-commentators), and rather comprise a whole class of literary works with countless different titles.⁸ Sharma’s charge that I did not pay regard to Vijayīndra Tīrtha’s reply to Appayadīkṣita’s critic [cf. 2] can in no way invalidate my arguments, since what Vijayīndra has to say on the point is really irrelevant. The highlights of his statements are summarized by Sharma as follows: “[...] To all these charges, Vijayīndra has given crushing replies. He points out that (1) quotations from unknown and untraceable sources are not wanting in the Bhāṣyas of Śāṅkara, Rāmānuja and Śrīkaṇṭha and that the charge against Madhva alone, savours of nothing but prejudice. The authors of Kalpa Sūtras, too have quoted from many the grace to withdraw his sweeping charges against Madhva and apologise for rushing into print on delusive data.”

5 Quoted in Mesquita op.cit. n. 20 [= 1997 n. 13].

6 See ibid. n. 49, 133, 192, 223-225, 227, 266, 338, 340, 346 [= 1997 n. 41; 122; 182; 213-215; 217; 256; 327; 329; p.137 n. 333].

7 See R. Mesquita, Madhva: Viṣṇutattvanirṇaya. Annotierte Übersetzung mit Studie. [Publications of the De Nobili Research Library 28]. Vienna 2000.

8 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 21f. [= 1997:18].

non-extant sources”.⁹ As one can see, Vijayāndra Tīrtha could supply only three (!) such instances of unknown sources in the commentaries of Śaṅkara (Sū III 2,18: mokṣaśāstreṣu [...] iti), Rāmānuja (Sū I 1,26: catuṣpadā ca gāyatrī kvacid drśyate / tadyathā [...] iti) and Śrīkaṇṭha (no particulars about the quote are given), and no evidence at all is produced for the unknown sources in the Kalpa Sūtras! Actually, this “crushing reply” is but a very meagre and unconvincing criticism.

Regarding the two unknown sources, namely Bhaviṣyatparvan and Brahmataraka, from which Madhva quotes most frequently and which therefore can be considered as crucial texts among the fictitious sources, Sharma remarks, in reference to the first source, that I adduce “no reasons whatsoever for saying that it has ‘nothing to do’” with the last part of the Harivaṃśa, called Bhaviṣyatparvan [cf. 2.5.6]. Again, Sharma makes selective use of my argumentation and fails to acknowledge that I have argued in very clear terms in several places of my monograph that Bhaviṣyatparvan, apart from presenting almost all the particular doctrines of Madhva,¹⁰ is heralding his arrival as aṃśāvatāra of Viṣṇu and consequently implying a vaticinium ex eventu, that is, a prophecy after its fulfillment, which allows us to be fairly sure that Madhva himself is the author of this source.¹¹

Similarly, Sharma’s remark that the phrase evam atītena prabandhenoktam—used by Jayatīrtha in his commentary of Viṣṇutattvanirṇaya to introduce a quotation from Brahmataraka—need not necessarily mean a ‘lost text’, but simply means a ‘previous text’, where ‘previous’ is anterior in the flow of discussion, rather than in time [cf. 4], this remark makes no sense, since this is the very first place in Viṣṇutattvanirṇaya where Brahmataraka is quoted;¹² atīta necessarily means a lost text and not a previous text.

I refrain here from commenting in detail on other unwarranted statements made by Sharma in this connection. Nevertheless, I would like to examine one more point in this discussion. In my monograph, I refuted the attempts of C.R.K. Rao to prove the authenticity of Brahmataraka on the basis of one presumptive independent passage of the same by being able to show that it was actually 9 See Sharma: History of the Dvaita School of Vedānta and its Literature, Volume II. Bombay: 1961, p. 177f.

10 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 169ff. [= 1997:137ff.]

11 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 61f.; 69f.; 79; 162f. [= 1997: 48f.; 55f.; 63f.; 130f.].

12 See VTN (p. 17,1-18,11) (= VTNT [Madras 1969], p. 360,16). There are also two other quotes from this source at the end of VTN (p. 43,5-9 and 43,12-14).

Madhva's original quote!¹³ Now, Sharma thinks he can offer 'new evidence' for its authenticity and refers to the polemical discussion between the Dvaitin Vyāsarāya (1460-1539) and his opponent Madhusūdana Sarasvatī on the validity of Āgama as recorded in a fictitious quote attributed by Madhva to Brahmatarka in Viṣṇutattvanirṇaya. However, the discussion in this case is not focused on the quote as such but on the teaching, which is flatly rejected by Madhusūdana as non-Vedic. His own teaching, on the contrary, he says, is Vedic (na ca tad vaidikārthaviṣayam iti vācyam, advaitasyāpi vaidikārthaviṣayatvāt). How can this polemic convey new evidence for the authenticity of Brahmatarka? And why should we admit that Madhusūdana Sarasvatī accepted the validity of the quote, as Sharma tries to insinuate?

It is somehow surprising that Sharma does not reason in this connection with regard to the arguments put forward by me to prove that Brahmatarka was a composition by Madhva; he is also completely silent on the three criteria I formulated for deciding that an unknown source goes back to Madhva.¹⁴ As a matter of fact, the first two criteria apply to Brahmatarka in as much as (1) it is quoted only by Madhva and deals with his particular teachings and (2) Madhva directly attributes the authorship of Brahmatarka to Viṣṇu.

As one can see, all the arguments which Sharma puts forward in defence of Brahmatarka as an ancient composition and thus not as Madhva's own work are not convincing at all. In his latest publication¹⁵ Sharma makes a new attempt in this regard, basing his findings on sheer misquotation of my monograph. Since readers may not be acquainted with his recent pamphlet, I am compelled to quote Sharma's statements in full: "Brahma Tarka is Prof. Mesquita's main target of attack on Madhva. He regards it as a bogus work authored by Madhva himself and passed off as an ancient authority. This sensational theory of his rests on most slippery foundations of a passing reference to B.T. in the concluding Mangalacarana verse of Madhva's Upadhikhandana (brahmatarkokti margatah) [sic!] that the treatment of the subject is in accordance with the teachings of B.T. Reading too much between the lines of the Mangalacarana verse, Prof. Mesquita has a brain wave that the entire body of the text of the Up. Kh. is a verbatim carbon copy of B.T., barring the Mangalacarana."

13 See Mesquita op.cit. n. 162 [= 1997 n. 151]. While discussing this matter again (2001:14-15), Sharma misrepresents my original statements.

14 See ibid. p. 89ff. [= 1997:71ff.].

15 Sharma (2001:9f.); see above n. 3.

In reality, nowhere in my monograph is such a statement about the Upadhikhandana to be found. So no wonder that Sharma could not provide the precise location for his quotation!

The fact is that I had underscored that Brahmatarka stands out clearly from all other unknown sources of Madhva not only because it is the most quoted source in his different texts, but also because it is the basis for two other works of his, namely Pramāṇalakṣaṇa and Vādalakṣaṇa, known also as Kathālakṣaṇa, as Madhva states in the colophons: *ānandatīrthamuninā brahmatarkoktimārgataḥ | māṇalakṣaṇam ity uktam; ānandatīrthamuninā brahmatarkānusārataḥ | kathālakṣaṇam ity uktam.*¹⁶ None of them polemicizes against the famous dictum of Vimuktātman in defence of Māyāvāda: durghaṭatvam avidyayā bhūṣaṇam na tu dūṣaṇam, whereas Upadhikhandana, also known as Māyāvādupādhidūṣaṇa, criticizes it, without, however, mentioning Brahmatarka as its basis. As we clearly see, Sharma mistook the identity of Upadhikhandana. He is completely unaware of the fact that Madhva attributes, in his Chāndogyopaniṣadbhāṣya,¹⁷ the refutation of Vimuktātman’s teaching explicitly to Brahmatarka: dr̥ṣṭavastuno mithyāvāṅgikāre ca yuktyapekṣā | na tu satyatve –

*dr̥ṣṭasya satyatāyām tu yuktir vāyuktir eva vā |
bhūṣaṇam tasya mithyātve yuktyabhāvo ’tidūṣaṇam |
yuktiś ca doṣa eva syād balavanmānavarjitā |
iti brahmatarke*

For this reason, the entire argumentation of Sharma in this connection belongs to the realm of imagination, such as when he argues: “Having arrived at the conclusion that Up.Kh. itself is an integral part of the B.T., emanating from it, Prof. Mesquita triumphantly declares that the B.T. ‘polemizes upon istasiddhi’,” or when he remarks: “Prof. Mesquita’s ascription of B.T. to Madhva’s own authorship hinges on the casual reference to B.T. in the concluding Mangala verse of Madhva’s Up. Kh. and gives him a jumping ground [...] The Up. Khandana is an out and out dialectical work cap a pie demolishing the Advaita doctrine of Brahmājñānavāda from beginning to end [...] The B.T. on the other hand is a constructive treatise dealing with a wide range of subjects [...] The two works are not thus in pari materia and a dialectical work like the Up. Khandana cannot be treated as forming a part of the B.T. by any stretch of the imagination.”

16 See Mesquita op.cit. n. 160 (= 1997 n. 149).

17 See Mesquita op.cit. n. 171-172 (=1997:160-161).

Thus, Sharma's new attempt to prove the veracity of Brahmatarka has gone completely wrong.

Sharma's objections [cf. 3] to my findings about Madhva's quotations attributed to the Purāṇas are also ill-founded, since his argumentation is based on wrong assumptions. My discussion of the Purāṇa texts is founded upon the presupposition that the textual variations as well as the textual extensions build the backbone of anonymous literature.¹⁸ As such, the Purāṇa literature supposes a manifold historical development, in which a single text takes shape slowly over centuries through the redactionary activities of several authors, so that one could theoretically assume that Madhva might have had knowledge of textual portions unknown to us. However, the untraceable Purāṇa quotations of Madhva have an intimate relation with his typical teachings, and their phrasing bears Madhva's mark. These facts do not allow for any other conclusion than that he himself composed the passages in question.

Extensive elaboration regarding this conclusion based on a large number of Madhva's quotations has been presented by me in the section of my book "Redactional Criteria for the Authorship of Madhva". Sharma completely ignored it in his review,¹⁹ while other reviewers took special notice of this 18 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 81; 139f.; 152ff. [= 1997:64; 112.; 122ff.].

19 Similarly, in his recent pamphlet (2001:27f.; see above n. 3) Sharma refrains from discussing the merits of the redactional criteria I worked out in order to prove the authorship of Madhva. However, he picks a single instance out of a set of cases I investigated for this purpose, in which the reality and the eternity of the universe (prapañcasyānādisatyatva) is proved by Madhva on the basis of Māṇḍūkyopaniṣad I 17-18. As a matter of fact, the thesis of monism expressed in these verses is twisted by Madhva by replacing jñāte by ajñāte (I 18d: upadeśād ayaṃ vādo jñāte dvaitaṃ na vidyate), so that it means just the opposite. In support of this interpretation Madhva presents two fictitious quotations from Paramaśruti and Brahmatarka (see Mesquita op.cit. p. 104ff. [= 1997:83ff.]. The several arguments put forward by Sharma to justify the alteration of the original text cannot be scrutinized here. But the conclusion drawn by him is of special interest for our purpose: "It is therefore in keeping with these facts to read Jnate Dvaitam na vidyate with an elided "a" grammatically permissible here." Even granted that this is the case, it is surprising that Sharma shied away from mentioning that Madhva elsewhere comments on the same verse of Māṇḍūkyopaniṣad without making any change in the text and giving another interpretation. The deviant interpretation is also supported by an anonymous quotation (iti ca), as I noted in two different places of my monograph. Sharma is also completely silent on the two different explanations of Chāndogyopaniṣad (VI 9,4), the first based on the transmitted reading tat tvam asi and the second based on the altered reading atat tvam asi, which contradicts all existing traditions. The first explanation is supported by the fictitious Brahmatarka and the second by a fake quotation from Sāmasaṃhitā. (see Mesquita op.cit. p. 101; 108 n. 204; p. 117 [= 1997:81; 87 n. 194; p. 94]).

discussion on the characteristic feature of Madhva's sources, for instance Dr. Houben: "The case for the existence of a large number of genuinely old texts and passages which have all disappeared precisely when they are supportive of Madhva's peculiar doctrine has indeed become very weak with the present stage of research and esp. with Mesquita's work."²⁰

But there is also another weighty and convincing reason for the authorship of Madhva, namely his avatāra-claim. I have elaborated in detail how Madhva puts forward the peculiar teaching of his avatāra-claim by adapting existing thought patterns.²¹ Madhva is the third earthly incarnation of Vāyu, who is essentially connected with Viṣṇu as his antaraṅga (ānandatīrthavarānāmavati trītyā bhaumī tanur marutaḥ). As the third incarnation of Vāyu, Madhva is allotted the task of imparting the knowledge (jñānakārya), and carries out this divine task in the name and on the command of Viṣṇu: pūrṇaprajñas trītyas tu bhagavatkāryasādhakaḥ. This claim enables Madhva to justify that the unknown texts are not fabricated by him but inspired by Viṣṇu himself. Consequently, Viṣṇu is ultimately the author of the literary compositions of Madhva without Madhva ceasing to be their author. In order to underscore this fact he applies a literary device found in the Mahābhārata, in the Bhagavadgītā and in the Pañcarātrasaṃhitās²² in that he attributes directly to Viṣṇu not only his unknown sources but also his peculiar doctrinal tenets (satsiddhāntaḥ = sarvanirṇayāḥ) and even his logical argumentation to demonstrate them (yuktayo nirṇayasyaiva svayam bhagavatoditāḥ). I have provided a long list of such passages in my monograph.²³ In face of this clear exposition, Sharma's misleading remark [cf. 4] that I did not take into consideration the Vaiṣṇava doctrine that all Pañcarātra texts are authored by Nārāyaṇa is not quite acceptable. In fact, I have adduced to that purpose not only a single instance (MBh XII 337, 63), as Sharma does, but a number of other instances, such as MBh VI 63,5cd; ViṣP III 3,31cd; III 4,5; II 11,7ab; Gī XV 15cd; PadP I 1,44; Īśvarasaṃhitā I 53cd-54ab; Śāṅkara's Gītabhāṣya (upodghāta) and also similar teachings in the classical Sāṃkhya-Yoga texts, where Kapila is described as an incarnation of Īśvara or as Īśvara-mahaṛṣi or as an avatāra of Viṣṇu.²⁴ It is incredible that Sharma overlooked all these details mentioned in my study. And this is not the only area where Sharma refuses to acknowledge the evidence supplied in the monograph! Throughout his 20 See above n. 2; see also Mesquita op.cit. p. 175f. [= 1997:142f.].

21 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 35ff. and p. 63ff. [= 1997:29ff. and 51ff.]; see also below n. 49.

22 See ibid. n. 56; 135; 142 and 269 [= 1997 n. 48; 124; 131 and 259].

23 See ibid. p. 81ff. [= 1997:65ff.].

24 See J. Bronkhorst: The Two Sources of Indian Asceticism. Delhi: 1998, p. 69f., quoted in Mesquita op.cit. n.11.

review Sharma carefully avoids referring to the avatāra-claim of Madhva when he discusses the problem of unknown sources, and also fails to recognize that Madhva's unknown quotations appear only when he puts forward his peculiar doctrine. Without consideration of these two sides of one and same coin, the assessment of Madhva's unknown sources is completely unconvincing!

Hence I find his statement that I do not accept the existence of some of Madhva's sources [cf. 1; 2 and 4] arbitrary, since I did clearly acknowledge that Madhva quotes from some old well-known texts having titles such as Pañgiśruti and Bhāllaveyaśruti. As the text passages attributed to them by Madhva are supportive of the typical teaching of Madhva and therefore only traceable from Madhva onwards, I labelled these passages fictitious.²⁵ This means that these text passages were not transmitted from generation to generation and accepted by śiṣṭas before Madhva's time. The question of credibility implied here is to be solved within the framework of aṃśāvātāra. From Madhva's own statements it is clear that he is sincerely convinced of his mission to proclaim all canonical works in the name of Viṣṇu in the kali-age by virtue of divine charisma (viṣṇu-prasādāt). As outstanding evidence for this conviction let me quote a statement made by Madhva at the end of his commentary to the Mahābhārata:²⁶

ānandatīrthākhyamuniḥ supūrṇaprajñābhido grantham imaṃ cakāra |
nārāyaṇenābhihito badaryāṃ tasyaiva śiṣyo jagadekabhartuḥ ||
yas tatprasādād akhilāṃś ca vedān sapañcarātrān sarahasyasaṅgrahān |²⁷
vedetihāsāṃś ca purāṇayuktān yathāvad anyā api sarvavidyāḥ |

The sage called Ānandatīrtha, [also] having the name Supūrṇaprajña, composed the present work in verse [...] and who (yas) composed also (ca) by the grace of Viṣṇu all the [eternal] Vedas and Itihāsas as [the fifth] Veda²⁸ together with Purāṇas and Pañcarātrasaṃhitās, summarizing the secret doctrines, as well as all other Vidyās in a very exact way.

25 See above n. 3; below 36; 38.

26 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 10f. and 63ff. [= 1997:51f.].

27 It is to be noted that there is a metrical lapse in the second quarter, which contains 12 syllables instead of 11! Such metrical and also grammatical irregularities were referred to by Appayadīkṣita. They are found in several fake verses ascribed by Madhva to well-known and also completely unknown text titles. Sharma [cf. 6] regards these irregularities as “minor issues” or “irrelevant criticisms” having “only a nuisance value”. Details concerning these irregularities will be discussed in my forthcoming publication containing a collection of approximately 2,000 fictitious verses attributed by Madhva to both well-known and unknown Purāṇa titles.

28 Madhva restores the five eternal Vedas, as their original meaning was concealed in the Kaliyuga by the authors (vadadbhir gūhita, see Mesquita op.cit. p. 56f. [= 1997:45f.]). Surely Madhva is following here the traditional teaching mentioned by Śāṅkara in his Brahmasūtrabhāṣya (ad Sū. I 3,29) that Mahariṣis restore the Veda together with the Itihāsas

As a matter of fact, the works mentioned here cover the domain of all the unknown sources Madhva quotes in his works. Further, the above-mentioned solemn declaration is not a casual outburst, but rather a fruit of the spiritual appropriation (āveśa) of Madhva by Viṣṇu²⁹, a mystical insight (jñānadīpana) hidden at the end of the age through the power of their religious austerities: vedavyāsaś caivam eva smarati –

*yugānte 'ntarhitān vedān setihāsān maharaṣayaḥ |
lebhire tapasā pūrvam anujñātāḥ svayambhūvā ||*

Madhva, as an inspired author, is a fortiori empowered to do the same by the grace of Viṣṇu (viṣṇuprasādāt). As such, he also produces the temporal Veda, namely the fifth Veda, which is different from the eternal Vedas: vedād api paraṃ cakre pañcamam vedam uttamam [...] iti nārāyaṇāṣṭākṣarakalpe [untraceable] (GīBh p. 2,5f.); cf. also BSūBh (p. 65,24-26): anuktaṃ pañcabhir vedair na vastv asti kutaścana | ato vedatvam eteṣāṃ yatas te sarva-vedakāḥ || iti skānde (untraceable). We might also note that veda is put in samāsa with itihāsa [cf. Arthasāstra I 3,1-2: sāmargyajurvedās trayas trayī | atharvavedetihāsavedau ca vedāḥ], since itihāsa is the first member of the pañcamaveda, cf. ChU VII 1,4: itihāsa-purāṇāḥ pañcamo vedānām vedāḥ; see also Mesquita op.cit. 126ff.; 157 n. 325 [= 1997: 101ff.; 126 n. 314]. Again, in the Adhyāya (IX 114ff.) in the same contextual connection, Madhva, being ṭṛtīyā bhaumī tanur marutas (= Marutsuta; see Mesquita op.cit. 47f. [= 1997: 57f.]) and a devotee of Viṣṇu at Badarī (!), appears as proclaimer of the eternal Veda as well as of the fifth Veda and also as commentator of the Brahmasūtras: itthaṃ sa gūyañ chatakoṭivistaramḥ rāmāyaṇam bhāratapañcarātram | vedāṃś ca sarvān sahitabrahma-sūtrān vyācakṣāṇo nityasukhodbharo 'bhūt || [...] ity [...] viṣṇor eva prasādātāḥ [...] mayeyam satkathoditā; (see Mesquita op.cit. 71 n. 122 [= 1997:57 n. 112]). The possession (āveśa) of Madhva by Viṣṇu implies that he is personally present in Madhva (see Mesquita op.cit. 75 n. 128 [= 1997:59 n. 117]). This intimate relation between Viṣṇu and Madhva allows one to transfer the characteristic qualities of Viṣṇu to Madhva. Their roles are within certain limits interchangeable (cf. ibid. p. 78 n. 134 = [1997:62 n. 123]). For this reason, Viṣṇu is ultimately the author of the literary compositions of Madhva without Madhva ceasing to be their author. Accordingly, Viṣṇu is also the author of the Veda (Bhāgavata-tātparyanirṇaya p. 395,5-6):

*vedānām prathamō vaktā harir eva yato vibhuḥ |
ato viṣṇvātmakā vedā ity āhur vedavūdināḥ ||
iti śabdānirṇaye (untraceable).*

Taking all these points into consideration, I translated vedetihāsān in the second verse quoted above as a karmadhārayasamāsa. Sharma (2001:27), on the contrary, separates veda from itihāsān and translates it as a finite verb. His translation is, however, based on the wrong assumption “that the Vedas have already been mentioned in the plural as Vedan in the first quarter and that the term Veda in the third quarter is the finite verb of the entire verse.” As a matter of fact, Madhva speaks here of two kinds of Veda, namely eternal Veda as vedān and temporal Veda as pañcamaveda (= vedetihāsān) and they are—according to Madhva—two different collections of texts, as taught in the SkandaP and Nārāyaṇāṣṭākṣarakalpa: vedād api paraṃ cakre pañcamam vedam uttamam.

29 See Mesquita op.cit. n. 123; 128; 133; 355f. [= 1997 n.113; 117; 122; 342f.].

which empowers him to speak on behalf of Viṣṇu. We find the testimony of this experience in several other places. For instance in MBhTN (I 136-137):

viṣṇvājñayaiva viduṣā tatprasādabalonateḥ |
ānandatīrthamuninā pūrṇaprajñābhīdhāyujā |
tātparyam sūstrāṇām sarveṣām uttamaṃ mayā proktam |
prāpyānujñām viṣṇor etaj jñātvaiva viṣṇur āpyate 'sau |

Another important statement of Madhva stands in harmony with it, namely that he, as the third aṃśāvātāra of Viṣṇu, performs deeds of the Lord: *pūrṇaprajñas trītyas tu bhagavatkāryasādhakah.*³⁰

It is clear that these statements of Madhva bear witness to the fact that he is the composer of all such canonical works. For Sharma, on the contrary [cf. 6], there is only circumstantial evidence for the claim that Madhva could be their author. Since as Sharma attests, “circumstantial evidence is acceptable when direct witnesses are not available,” one wonders why Sharma does not give credit to Madhva.

Besides, Sharma apparently tries to depict me as a śiṣya of Appayadīkṣita, though it is evident to any careful reader of my book that I dissociate myself from describing Madhva's sources and quotations as svamātrakalpita or svakapolakalpita as Appayadīkṣita and Varadaguru or other Indian scholars have done.³¹ Nor did I state that Madhva “commits the fraud in honesty,” as Sharma tries to make me say [cf.1].

As concerns Madhva's critics, I tried to explore views put forward by the followers of the Madhva-School, especially by Sharma himself, who criticizes me in this connection for not having consulted his History of the Dvaita School of Vedānta [cf. 5]. According to him, the Viśiṣṭādvaitin Veṅkaṭanātha too had challenged the genuineness of Madhva's sources. His statement in this regard runs: “The attempt to discredit the sources of Madhva is of much later origin, springing from the days of Appaya Dīkṣita. He was the first to raise the cry which was assiduously taken up by others like Bhaṭṭoji and Veṅkatanātha.”³² In commenting on this remark in my monograph I pointed out that a factual historical error was contained in Sharma's statement, since Veṅkatanātha lived three centuries before Appayadīkṣita and his pupil Bhaṭṭoji. As I see it, my correct dating of Veṅkatanātha destroyed a myth built up around Appayadīkṣita, 30 MBhTN II 118cd; see Mesquita op.cit. n. 81f. [= 1997 n. 72f.]; [...] madhvo yat tu trītyakam kṛtam idam bhāṣyam hi tena prabhau, see Mesquita op.cit. 55ff. [= 1997:44ff.].

31 See ibid. p. 14; n. 16 and p. 25 [= 1997:12; n. 9 and p. 21f.].

32 See Sharma 1960:114 quoted in R. Mesquita op.cit. 27 n. 28 [= Mesquita 1997 n. 21].

considered among the Madhvites as the first person to attack Madhva and his doctrine. And it seems to me that Sharma, in order to keep this legend alive [cf. 5], dropped Veṅkaṭanātha altogether from the list of Madhva's critics! In his review, Sharma states that he does not accept that Veṅkaṭanātha lived during Madhva's time or that he challenged the genuineness of his sources! To these comments he adds the blunt and somewhat cryptic remark: "[...] but this is not the time to discuss the issue in detail," and proceeds with a verbal attack on me: "[...] A random or undirected diatribe about people who use unknown sources cannot be correlated with Madhva except by a stretch of Mesquita's ill-founded imagination."

Actually, the date of Veṅkaṭanātha (1268-1369) is not controversial,³³ and Sharma himself puts him very close to the time of Madhva [cf. 6]. According to him, Veṅkaṭanātha was a contemporary of the immediate disciple of Madhva, namely Akṣobhya [cf.6].³⁴ Despite the fact that Sharma distanced himself from his previous position that Veṅkaṭanātha too criticized the unknown sources of Madhva, there is strong evidence for its acceptance. This will be shown here again in brief. In his Gītātātparyanirṇaya (ad Gī V 4-5) Madhva says that a householder attains liberation not only by means of ritual but also through knowledge. Without true knowledge—he continues—a correct performance of the ritual acts is not possible (tasmāḥ jñāninām karmāpy anuṣṭheyam | karminām api grhasthānām jñātavyo bhagavān | na hi jñānaṃ vinā karmaṇaḥ samyaganu-ṣṭhānaṃ bhavati).³⁵ In order to substantiate this statement Madhva provides the following quotation from the Vyāsa-smṛti:

*niṣkāmaṃ jñānapūrvam ca nivṛttam iha cocyate |
nivṛttam sevamānas tu brahmābhyeti sanātanam |
buddhyāvihimsan puṣpair vā praṇavena samarcayet |
vāsudevātmakeṣu brahma mūlamantreṇa vā yatih |
muktir asīti niyamo brahmadṛg yasya vidyate |
tasyāpy ānandavṛddhiḥ syād vaiṣṇavaṃ karma kurvataḥ |*

33 See Singh 1938:3f.; Mesquita l.c.; see also G. Oberhammer, who holds to this date (Materialien zur Geschichte der Rāmānuja-Schule I: Parāśarabhaṭṭas Tattvaratnākaraḥ [SbÖAW 346 = Veröffentlichungen der Kommission für Sprachen und Kulturen Südasiens 14]. Wien: 1979, p. 15), and P.Y. Mumme (The Śrīvaiṣṇava Theological Dispute. Maṇavālamāmuni and Vedānta Deśika. Madras: 1988, p. 10f.). Varadaguru was immediate predecessor of Veṅkaṭanātha, see S. Stark, Vātsya Varadaguru, ed. [SbÖAW 570= Beiträge zur Kultur- und Geistesgeschichte Asiens 4]. Wien: 1990, Teil 1: Kritische Textedition, p. 24f.

34 See Sharma 1960:300; see below p. 195.

35 Since I have discussed this passage in detail in my forthcoming paper on Madhva's concept of jīvanmukti, I shall confine the discussion to the subject matter at hand.

*karma brahmadṛṣū hīnaṃ na mukhyam iti kīrtitam |
 tasmāt karmeti tat prāhur yat kṛtaṃ brahmadarśinā |
 etasmān nyāsināṃ lokam samyānti grhiṇo 'pi hi |
 jñānamūrgaḥ karmamūrga iti bhedas tato na hi |
 tasmād āśramabhedo 'yaṃ karmasaṃkocasaṃbhavaḥ |
 iti vyāsaśmṛteḥ |*

As a matter of fact, the quotation is not recorded in the Vyāsaśmṛti.³⁶ The first śloka is identified by Madhva in Gītabhāṣya (ad Gī III 4) as belonging to the Manusmṛti and in Bhāgavatātātparyanirṇaya (p. 660,5-6) as stemming from the Mahābhārata (untraceable!). It is to be noted that the quotation is much closer in wording and content to KūrmaP,³⁷ which Madhva nowhere mentions in this connection. In harmony with Madhva's statement, the first śloka also teaches that the ritual acts based on true knowledge bring about liberation. The following five and a half ślokas have been spontaneously supplemented by Madhva, with their focus on yatidharma, and we see a sudden switch from grhasthadharma to yatidharma. The common feature of both dharmas is that they, as nivṛttadharmas, are based on the true knowledge of God. The last one and a half ślokas are of special interest for our purpose. They run: "Therefore, the householders, too, are surely equal in rank to the renunciators. For this reason, there is no difference indeed between the path of knowledge and that of ritual acts. On 36 See. Vol. 3 (p. 1631ff.), in: Smṛtisandarbhā—The Smṛiti Sandarbha. Collection of the [...] Dharmashastric Texts by Maharshies, Vols 1-6. Delhi 1988. We have here a collection of Smṛti texts with a complete Vyāsaśmṛti, which Sharma was searching for (cf. 2.5.5). However, there are no traces whatsoever of Madhva's unknown quotations attributed to it. I have collected altogether 17 quotations ascribed to Vyāsaśmṛti in Madhva's different works. Not a single one of them could be identified as such!

37 In MuUBh (p. 492,22-23) however, Madhva attributes it again to Vyāsaśmṛti; cf. Manusmṛti (XII 89-90):

*iha cāmutra vā kāmyaṃ pravṛttaṃ karma kīrtyate |
 niṣkāmaṃ jñānapūrvaṃ tu nivṛttam upadiśyate ||
 [akāmopahataṃ nityaṃ nivṛttaṃ ca vidhīyate |
 kāmatas tu kṛtaṃ karma pravṛttam upadiśyate ||]
 pravṛttaṃ karma saṃsevya devānām eti sāmīyatām |
 nivṛttaṃ sevamānas tu bhūtāny eti pañca vai ||
 also KūrmaP (I 2,63f.):
 tasmāj jñānena sahitaṃ karmayogaṃ samāśrayet |
 pravṛttaṃ ca nivṛttaṃ dvividhaṃ karma vaidikam |
 jñānapūrvaṃ nivṛttaṃ syāt pravṛttaṃ yad ato anyathā |
 nivṛttaṃ sevamānas tu yāti tat paraṃ padam |
 tasmān nivṛttaṃ saṃsevyaṃ anyathā saṃsaret punaḥ |
 [...]*

this account, the distinction between āśramas narrows [the concept] of karman [since nivṛttam karman is not a specific feature of the renouncer alone, but also of a householder].” This is taught in the Vyāsasmṛti.

Especially striking in this remark is the fact that the rigid laws of the Brāhmaṇical tradition regarding āśramas are downgraded, since the householder is brought clearly into line with the renouncer. And this implies a violation of the strict separation of the four āśramas with their respective specific liṅgas and their respective special dharmas, as well as a violation of the orderly passage from one āśrama to the next envisaged in the varṇāśramadharmā. Veṅkaṭanātha criticizes exactly this point of view in his Alepamatabhaṅgavāda when he speaks of ‘abandonment of all āśramas’ (sarvāśramaparityāgokti) and argues in the following way: “On the contrary, the Veda first establishes the āśramas in the passage: ‘There are three divisions of dharma,’ and goes on to declare that immortality is gained only by the knowers of Brahman who belong to an āśrama: ‘He who is established in Brahman attains immortality’ [ChU 2,23]. The following passage teaches that a knower of Brahman who devotes himself to the householder’s dharma until death does not return to this life [...] [ChU 8.15.1]. Passages such as the following, moreover, teach that rites devoid of knowledge produce temporary results, whereas rites accompanied by knowledge produce permanent results [...] [BāU 3.8.10]. It is not possible, therefore, to abandon the dharma proper to one’s own varṇa and āśrama at any time during one’s life.”

A scrutiny of Madhva’s quotation from the Vyāsasmṛti and Veṅkaṭanātha’s criticism shows that they have a close relationship regarding the points discussed. Nevertheless, a sharp contrast is also noticeable. Madhva does not accept a clear-cut division of āśramas: tasmād āśramabhedo ’yam karmasaṃkocasaṃbhavaḥ.³⁸ Veṅkaṭanātha, on the contrary, makes no exception at all regarding the boundaries of the āśramadharmā: ato na kadācid api yāvajjīvaṃ svavarṇāśramocitadharmasvarūpatyāgasambhavaḥ. Whereas Veṅkaṭanātha bases his teachings on the authority of the Veda, he at the same time makes clear that his opponents can put forward only faked passages in support of their position: “There are other passages which are not found in acknowledged Vedas and smṛtis. Sinful people, because of their devotion to opinions that accord with their 38 See Gītābhāṣya (p. 39,17-18): saṃnyāsaḥ kāmyakarmaparityāgaḥ | kāmyānām karmaṇām nyāsaṃ saṃnyāsam iti vakṣyamānatvāt [= Gītā XVIII 2ab]; ibid. (p. 151,18-19): brahmacārī gr̥hastho vā vānaprastho yatis tathā | yadīcchen mokṣām āsthātum uttamam āśramam āśrayet | iryādīvyāsasmṛti (untraceable), see above n. 37.

See also another untraceable quotation attributed to NārādīyaP. (GīBh p. 58,10-13):

conduct, first interpolate them and then claim to find them in some Purāṇas that are not well known, or whose collections are lost, or whose beginnings and ends are not determined [...]”³⁹

In his Yatiliṅgabhedabhaṅga, Veṅkaṭanātha identifies these authors as some people (kaiścit) who quote statements of Vyāsa and of his pupils (vyāsādivacana).⁴⁰ Thus it cannot be just coincidental that the source quoted by Madhva to substantiate his peculiar teachings is called Vyāsasmṛti! Just as the name of this source arouses curiosity, so does the way the quotation was composed. As already mentioned, only the first śloka, is traceable to Manusmṛti (XII 89), the rest is supplemented by Madhva, who makes the use of a lacuna after śloka 89. The editions of the Manusmṛti⁴¹ insert an additional verse in brackets after this śloka, indicating that the records of this text are not uniform. And this is precisely the way Veṅkaṭanātha describes non-genuine literary sources to have been composed. Veṅkaṭanātha does not name his opponents, but the details given by him are so accurate that we can easily identify one of them as Madhva.⁴² And

...

madbhaktiś ca viraktis tadadhikāro nigadyate |
yadādhikāro bhavati brahmacārya api pravajet | iti nārādīye.

39 For transl. see P. Olivelle, Renunciation in Hinduism. A Medieval Debate, Vol. II, The Viśiṣṭādvaita Argument. Vienna: 1987, p. 153.

40 See ibid. P. Olivelle, op.cit. p. 153 and 88f.: “[...] With a preconcerted sign, therefore, fling the names such as Vyāsa at those who forge such statements, and, like Dharma’s son [Yudhishṭhira], become a speaker of the truth.” See also Mesquita op.cit. 28n. 29-30 [= 1997: 23n. 22f.] and BSūBh (p. 33, 17-18: ... iti skandavacanāt).

41 See for example Manusmṛti ed. with Maṅḍīpabhā Hindī Comm. by H. Śāstrī. Varanasi: 1970, and MS ed. with Sanskrit Comm. Manvarthamuktāvalī of Kullūka Bhaṭṭa, ed. by J.L. Shastri. Delhi: 1990.

42 It is very strange that Sharma makes big fuss in his recent pamphlet (Sharma 2001:17; see above n. 3) over the fact that Veṅkaṭanātha does not mention Madhva while criticizing his unknown sources: “While Appayya has expressly named M why has the author of the Alepakamatabhaṅga not named M? What is the Professor’s answer to these straight questions? Or, is it all a case of pure hallucination on his part? Who are the Papiṣṭhas Venkatanatha has in mind? We wait for an answer. Or is it a case of Abaddham paṭhitva kucodyam karoti?”

Any scholar engaged in the research of the ancient Indian texts knows that the authors seldom name the persons or texts they criticize. Madhva too follows this custom. Not in a single case does he mention by name his opponents, not even his most hated adversaries, the advaitins he calls asuras (cf. Mesquita op.cit. p. 528 and 34 [Viṣṇutattvanirṇaya], see above n.7). For instance, he does not mention by name Vimuktātman when he criticizes his māyāvāda (see above p. 5) or Sarvajñātman, referred to simply as māyāvādī, although he anonymously quotes the Maṅgala-verse from Sankṣepaśārīraka (see Vāda p. 48,2-3 and Sharma's claim against this, that it is highly incredible that Veṅkaṭanātha, alias Deśika, could have accused Madhva of fabricating texts since he declared Akṣobhya, Madhva's disciple, the victor in a public debate on tat tvam asi against the Advaita author Vidyāraṇya Veṅkaṭanātha umpired [cf. 6], is pure overstatement—or perhaps just wishful thinking. Sharma passes over the details of this debate recorded in the tradition dating back to the 15th/16th century; he omits for instance that Veṅkaṭanātha was over 90 years old at the time of the debate.⁴³ At this stage he had composed all of his principal works, such as the Śatadūṣaṇī criticizing Madhva's sources; there are no traces of any revision of Veṅkaṭanātha's opinion in his later work, Rahasyatrayasāra, written after this famous debate. Furthermore, how can Sharma be sure that Veṅkaṭanātha's verdict has been given out of sympathy for Madhva's position and not out of his own personal conviction that the Advaita view is wrong, or out of aversion to persons like Vidyāraṇya who hold wrong monistic views? We have strong and solid reasons for the second and third possibilities only, for Veṅkaṭanātha has proved in his several books, especially in Śatadūṣaṇī (cf. esp. Vāda 36;37;59; 66), that the monistic view of Advaita was utterly false.⁴⁴ He expressed also in the same work his aversion to Advaitins: "Considering that any contact with them whatsoever, such as speaking with them during a debate, leads to hell, virtuous people keep far from them, and even at the mere sight of them they look at the sun [...] Conversations with them that include such things as studying and teaching 'That art thou' and other Great Sayings, which constitute an assault on dharma, are not allowed."⁴⁵ Taking all the above facts into consideration, we can conclude that it is not an ominous Veṅkaṭanātha who is speaking here against Madhva's unknown sources, but the real Veṅkaṭanātha, alias Vedānta Deśika, Mesquita op.cit. n. 176 [= 1997: n. 165]), or Śalikanātha when he polemicizes against his kāryānvitābhidhānavāda (see Mesquita op.cit. p. 391ff. [Viṣṇutattvanirṇaya]). Similarly, Veṅkaṭanātha in very few cases names his adversaries (see for instance below n. 44). In the Alepakamatabhaṅgavāda and Yatilingabhedabhaṅga, however, he does not specify his opponents by name. But the details given by him are enough to identify one of them as Madhva. And Appayadīkṣita's mentioning of Madhva is explained by the simple fact that he wrote two polemical works against Madhva's unknown sources, namely Madhvatantramukhamardana, with an Autocommentary Madhvatamatavidhvaṃsana – kiṃ bahunā?

43 See S. Singh, Vedānta Deśika. His Life, Works and Philosophy – A Study. Varanasi: 1958, p. 28f.

44 See Tattvaṭīkā (Stanza 5):

śūtitaḥ śatadūṣaṇyāṃ śaṅkarādīmudhāgrahaḥ |
 śārīrakaśarīraṃ tu vyaktam atra pradarsyate ||
 cf. also Śatadūṣaṇī (Stanza 3).

45 For transl. see P. Olivelle, op.cit. p. 117.

also known as Veṅkatācārya and Vedāntacārya, following his predecessor Varadaguru, as I put forward elsewhere.⁴⁶

In closing, I would like to thank and express my appreciation to Prof. Sharma, who is a reputed scholar from within the tradition, for taking interest in my publication. It is however highly regrettable that Prof. Sharma is so obsessed with the defence of the orthodox thinking of the School that he does not focus on the concrete and direct statements of Madhva. My closer scrutiny of these statements has shown that Madhva himself was indeed the author of his 'unknown sources' supporting his peculiar doctrine, and my conclusions have been accepted unanimously by independent scholars. To my surprise I found a cryptic remark in the latest publication of Prof. Sharma⁴⁷ where he does envisage the possibility of Madhva being the author of at least some of his untraceable quotations. The remark, based on the traditional teaching handed down by Śāṅkara in 46 See Mesquita op.cit. p. 27f. and p. 172 [= 1997:23f. and 139f.]. In (2001:15; see above n. 3), Sharma contends that Veṅkaṭanātha—mentioned by him in his remark on Madhva's critics, when he places him after Appaya Dīkṣita and Bhaṭṭoji [16th cent.] (see above n. 32)—“is a quite different person, later than Madhusudana Sarasvati and a cantankerous commentator on the Gīta. He has taken M. to task on several occasions.” I have been unable to identify this author on the basis of the scanty information Sharma has provided. This is not at all surprising given the “host of similar names of authors, Śrī-Vaiṣṇavites or non-Śrī-Vaiṣṇavites” (see S. Singh op.cit. p. 3). And Sharma's short description does not even allow us to decipher whether his 'Veṅkaṭanātha' was a Śrī-Vaiṣṇavite or a non-Śrī-Vaiṣṇavite, whether he criticized Madhva's unknown sources or his other particular teachings. There seems to be no Śrī-Vaiṣṇavite author in the 16th cent. to whom the particulars apply. In his History of Indian Philosophy (first Indian edition. Delhi 1975, vol. III: 117), Das Gupta refers to two Śrī-Vaiṣṇavites of the same name, namely Veṅkaṭācārya, also known as prativādībhakeśarī, probably an author of the 16th century, who wrote a brahmasūtrabhāṣyapūrvapakṣasaṃgrahakārikā, as well as ācāryapañcāśat and Veṅkaṭanāthārya, author of the work called śrībhāṣyasāra. Since none of them wrote a commentary on the Gītā, they cannot be identical with the Veṅkaṭanātha mentioned by Sharma. Even if we admit that there might have been 'Veṅkaṭanātha' in the 16th century, a cantankerous commentator on the Gītā, who criticized Madhva—one critic more than I had originally assumed—this by no means invalidates the fact that Veṅkaṭanātha, alias Vedāntadeśika, was Madhva's outspoken critic long before his namesake of the 16th cent.

Even Sāyana Mādharma (14th cent.), who relates in his Sarvadarśanasāṅgraha the teachings of Madhva faithfully on basis of his quotations, asserts at the end of his presentation that Madhva pretends (manyena) to be the third avatāra of Vāyu. In this way, he expresses his doubts about the sources of Madhva, exactly as Appayadīkṣita with his remark: svakalpita-vāyvavatāra, see Mesquita op.cit. p. 29 [= 1997:24].

47 See Sharma 2001:21.

his Brahmasūtrabhāṣya (ad Sū I 3,29), runs⁴⁸: “[...] If a gifted genius of a our times (sic) can do this, why disbelieve the ability of a great thinker like M to be able to recapture lost sakhas (sic) by his Yogic spiritual power, centuries ago, for the benefit of posterity?”⁴⁹

This would imply that the teaching ‘recaptured’ by Madhva is nowhere recorded but in the text passages produced by Madhva himself. Quod erat demonstrandum.

48 See above n. 28.

49 In this connection it is very strange that Sharma totally neglects another much more weighty and convincing reason for the authorship of Madhva, namely his avatāra-claim (see above n. 21) as he considers this issue too sensitive to be discussed (p. 7f.): “But this discussion should be in a balanced way, [...] without straying into sensitive issues relating to the Avatarhood of the person concerned.”