From Military Leaders to Administrative Experts: The Biography of the “Treacherous Minister” Temüder and his Ancestors

<https://doi.org/10.1515/asia-2017-0006>

Abstract: Temüder (d. 1322) was an influential Mongol official of the Yuan dynasty in the early fourteenth century. The compilers of the Yuanshi listed him as one of the six “treacherous ministers,” and it is easy to simply dismiss him accordingly. However, a closer examination of the life of Temüder himself and his ancestors reveals how the Mongol elites adapted and changed throughout time, and specifically how the earlier generation of military leaders transformed into administrative experts in civil administration and fiscal reform. Based on his biography in the Yuanshi, supplemented with a few scattered records from literary collections of Han-Chinese contemporaries and Persian-language sources, this article reconstructs the lives of Temüder, his ancestors, and his sons. In addition to balancing Temüder’s overwhelmingly negative image, this article ultimately shows how the ruling outsiders – here, the Mongol elites exemplified by the case of Temüder – also gained new expertise to further consolidate their rule over China, and provides a more complex and nuanced perspective for understanding the mid- to late-Yuan period.

Keywords: Yuan dynasty, acculturation, administration, treacherous ministers, Temüder

1 Introduction

Temüder (d. 1322, Ch. Tiemudie’er 鐵木迭兒 or 帖木迭兒) was not only one of the most influential high-ranking officials during the reign of Ayurbarwada (Renzong, r. 1311–1320) and Shidebala (Yingzong, r. 1320–1323), but also one of the six individuals included in the “Biography of Treacherous Ministers jian-chen zhuan 姦臣傳)” of the Yuanshi. What is less well-known is that he was a fourth-generation descendant of a Mongol general who fought together with Chinggis Khan and a strong advocate of fiscal reform and administrative centralization. In spite of his accomplishments, labeled as a “treacherous minister,” he has been overshadowed by the negative images and accordingly almost totally neglected in scholarly literature. However, the change in family status that occurred from Temüder’s ancestors to Temüder himself, who served as one of the most influential officials of the early fourteenth century, exemplifies changes among the Mongol ruling elites, specifically in how they adapted and expanded their expertise throughout the thirteenth century, and continued to do so as they governed the conquered lands in the fourteenth century.

This article expands the scope of analysis beyond the “treacherous minister” himself and includes an analysis of the underappreciated details of his ancestors. It, therefore, focuses on how Temüder, a descendant of an illustrious military general, became one of the most powerful administrators of the mid-Yuan period. Temüder’s administrative career provides a more nuanced understanding of the transformations of the Mongol elites after serving the government for four generations, an often-neglected perspective on the Mongols lost in both the broad characterization of the Mongols and detailed individual studies.

The main sources for reconstructing the life of Temüder and his ancestors consist of his biography in the Yuanshi, literary works that cover the lives of officials who interacted with Temüder, and scattered references to Temüder himself in the legal sources. Imperial eulogies that Emperor Ayurbarwada commissioned and Cheng Jufu 程鉅夫 eventually wrote in 1312,¹ together with a few scattered accounts in Persian sources, provide valuable original information especially about his ancestors. As he was labeled a “treacherous minister,” the remaining records of Temüder are hostile and critical, and, to some degree, the sources provide grounds for such infamy. However, the overall image arising from mining these multiple sources is more balanced and provides a window into a crucial aspect of Mongol rule in China. Moreover, this analysis enables us to think beyond the broad generalization of the Mongols – be it the long negative perception of Mongols as destructive warriors or the newer images of Mongols as facilitators of cross-cultural exchange – and emphasizes the change over time, as signified in the family transformation from Temüder’s ancestors to Temüder himself.

¹ Cheng Jufu, a well-known Confucian scholar official in the late 13th to early fourteenth century, passed away in 1318 without witnessing Temüder’s fall and eventual disgrace. Therefore, his works convey a positive image of Temüder’s ancestors that is barely visible in later sources. On the life and work of Cheng Jufu, see the introduction in the recently published punctuated edition of Cheng’s works. Cheng 2009: 1–9.

2 Temüder's ancestors

To understand the rise of Temüder and the transformation of his family, we must start from the lives of his ancestors. Most biographies in the Yuanshi provide some details on the ancestral background, the place of origin, and the early life of their individual subjects. Temüder's biography barely provides any of this background information; its opening lines only mention the name of his father.

Fortunately, Cheng Jufu's eulogies commemorating Temüder's ancestors enable us to glimpse something of Temüder's family background. His great-grandfather was a Mongol named *Suqai (Ch. Suohai 唆海). The eulogy dedicated to *Suqai, written as a poem, mostly consists of colorful vocabulary but falls short on detail. Nevertheless, it reveals that Temüder's great-grandfather had served Chinggis Khan and praises him for assisting in the founding of the Empire. The poem also describes *Suqai as wearing armor and holding a dagger-axe, clearing showing that he participated in military operations.²

Temüder's grandfather was Būrilgidei (Ch. Bulianjidai 不憐吉帶 or 不憐吉歹), literally meaning "a complete spear." He truly lived up to this name. Būrilgidei first served Ögödei Qa'an (r. 1229–1241), participated in the expedition against the Qiqchaqs during the 1230s, and engaged in operations in China during the reign of Güyük (r. 1246–1248). During the interregnum after Güyük's death and the following succession crisis,³ Būrilgidei remained loyal to Möngke. Accordingly, Möngke allocated troops to Būrilgidei in order to defend a region between Besh-Baligh and Qaraqorum.⁴ He was also in charge of defense against potential aggression from Yesü Möngke, Buri, and Khoja, all descendants of Ögödei or Chaghadaï (1183–1244) who opposed Möngke's succession.⁵ After Möngke had consolidated his control over the Empire, Būrilgidei participated in the expedition to southwest China led by Qubilai.⁶ Just like his father, and as his name implies, Būrilgidei was a proven and experienced general.⁷

⁵ Song 1976: 44.

⁶ Cheng 2009: 32; Song 1976: 50. The Bulianjidai 不憐吉歹 in the Chinese sources and the Būrilgidei in Persian sources most likely refer to the same person. See Juvaynī 1997: 247n9.

Bürilgidei had at least two sons, *Murchi (Ch. Mu'erhuochi 木兒火赤) and *Qoor Buqa (Ch. Hulu Buhua 忽魯不花, 1229–?). *Murchi accompanied Qubilai, and probably his father Bürilgidei, during the expedition to Yunnan 雲南 and Wuchang 武昌 in the 1250s. He remained loyal to Qubilai (r. 1260–1294) during the succession struggle with his younger brother Ariq Böke (d. 1264) in the early 1260s. During this period, he also helped Qubilai in suppressing the rebellion of Li Tan 李壇, a powerful Han-Chinese military warlord who had ambitions to become a more independent ruler.⁸ *Murchi died in this battle but was still praised for his bravery and ability to lead troops at the front.⁹

*Murchi's brother and Temüder's uncle *Qoor Buqa was an exception among the ancestors of Temüder, as he was the first to be involved in civil administration rather than serving purely as a military leader. In 1261, *Qoor Buqa was appointed Junior Chief Councilor of the Secretariat (zhongshu zuochengxiang 中書左丞相),¹⁰ one of the highest-ranking positions in the Secretariat, and the following year he also served as Head of Judges (du duan-shiguan 都斷事官) of the Central Secretariat.¹¹ Accordingly, the contemporary sources call him the “head of the Central Secretariat,”¹² and he was praised for his contribution to the establishment of the Yuan government.¹³

In sum, we can see that most of Temüder's ancestors established themselves on the battlefield, participating in various expeditions from the time of Chinggis other sources strongly support the possibility that they were two different individuals. For example, in contrast to the imperial eulogy commemorating Temüder's grandfather Bürilgidei that mentions his accomplishments in the 1250s, in the imperial eulogy commemorating the Bürilgidei, the Prince of Henan (also written by Cheng Jufu) does not mention any military accomplishment and only praises his commitment to administration (Cheng 2009: 51). Moreover, records of military activity are also missing from Tao Zongyi's work in which Tao discusses his own interaction with the Prince of Henan, Bürilgidei (Tao 1959: 158). Finally, the father of the Prince of Henan Bürilgidei, Aju 阿朮, was born in 1234 (See Song 1976: 3124 which states that he died at the age of 54 sui 歲 in 1286), and that would mean that even if Aju had become a father early, it would be hard to imagine a young Mongol in his teenage years being assigned to the important military positions occupied by Temüder's grandfather.

⁸ On the rebellion of Li Tan, see Chan 1993.

⁹ Cheng 2009: 33. *Morqochi's eulogy says he participated and eventually died “suppressing the rebels in Jinan 濟南,” the place of Li Tan's rebellion.

¹⁰ Wang 1985: 374. Wang Yun clearly adds the annotation that *Qulu Buqa was the second son of Bürilgidei and that he was 31 sui at that time.

¹¹ Song 1976: 45.

¹² Chen et al. 2011: 1104. In theory, the Senior Chief Councilor of the Secretariat (zhongshu youchengxiang 中書右丞相) would outrank *Qulu Buqa's position as Junior Chief Councilor, but in this period, the seemingly systematic Chinese titles do not necessarily reflect reality.

Khan to Qubilai. They were living examples of the Mongol warriors who built the Empire on horseback. By the third generation, however, the members of this once militant family had already been expanding their expertise into civil administration, as seen in the service of *Qoor Buqa.

3 Accumulating experience

Temüder's rise to power did not occur suddenly. Three factors – his family background, the breadth of his experience in the central and local government, and his connections to the imperial household – contributed to his success.

Temüder started his career during Qubilai's reign, but his specific role is unclear. Considering that he was a fourth-generation descendant of an influential Mongol family with a long history of serving the Empire, Qubilai possibly appointed him as a member of the imperial guards, the keshig. Then, during Temür's reign (1294–1307), Temüder served as Associate Director of the Bureau for Imperial Household Provisions (tongzhi huizhengyuan shi 同知宣徽院事) and subsequently as the Director of the Bureau for Communications Services (tongzhengyuan shi 通政院使).¹⁴

The significance of the first position deserves a closer explanation. The Associate Director of the Bureau for Imperial Household Provisions was the second-highest-ranking position in the Bureau, which oversaw food supplies and provision for the imperial household and members of the imperial bodyguard, as well as sacrificial objects for state rituals. The high rank of this office (congyi 從一, 1B), the second-highest following zhengyi 正一, 1A), and the ability of its holder to select his own officials without going through the Central Secretariat's approval processes attest to its importance.¹⁵ This Bureau was in fact the reincarnation of the keshig position known as ba'urchi (Mo. “cook,” but also “steward” or “commissary”), whose holders maintained proximity to the emperor. The office often served as a springboard for illustrious careers, as seen in the rather well-known examples of the grand historian Rashīd al-Dīn (d. 1318) in Iran, the “cultural broker” Bolad (d. 1313), and the influential minister El Temür (d. 1333).¹⁶ Temüder's appointment to this position further supports the assumption that he started his career in the keshig. It was also probably in this period that he formed close connections with members of the imperial family, especially the Empress Dowager Targi (d. 1322), who remained his most powerful ally.¹⁷

After Temür's death and throughout the rule of Qaishan (Wuzong, r. 1307–1311) Temüder held several high-ranking positions in both central and local government. In 1307, he served as one of four Directors of the Bureau for Imperial Household Provisions¹⁸ and the Privy Councilor of Jiangxi Branch Secretariat (Jiangxi xingsheng pingzhang zhengshi 江行省平章政事).¹⁹ Later, in 1308, he was the Senior Chief Councilor of the Central Secretariat²⁰ and then the Junior Vice Councilor of Yunnan Branch Secretariat (Yunnan xingsheng zuochengxiang 雲南行省左丞相).²¹ Temüder's experience in the local governments of Jiangxi and Yunnan must have provided valuable experience for the reforms he later proposed that addressed both central and local government, as we will see below.

Temüder seemingly did not enjoy his time in Yunnan, as his response to this appointment resulted in a rather radical measure. In 1310, two years after being sent to Yunnan, he left his position without permission and returned to the capital. Such insubordinate behavior prompted the Secretariat of State Affairs (shangshusheng 尚書省)²² to submit a memorial requesting an investigation, and the emperor approved this request.²³ This is when the sources first reveal the influence of one of Temüder's most powerful allies – the Empress Dowager Targi. Due to her intervention, any charges against Temüder were dismissed, and although he had to return to Yunnan, he did so without punishment.²⁴

4 Reformer or dictator?

In the first five years of Ayurbarwarda's reign, Temüder became one of the most powerful individuals in the Yuan government. During the transition between

Qaishan and Ayurbarwarda in 1311, on Targi's initiative, Temüder returned to the capital from Yunnan and once again became the Secretariat's Senior Chief Councilor.²⁵ The newly crowned Emperor Ayurbarwarda also supported Temüder. In the edict announcing his accession, the emperor clearly stated how the wrongdoings of the Qaishan era would be fixed under the new leadership of the Central Secretariat, led by Councilor Temüder himself and two Privy Councilors, Öljei (Ch. Wanze 完澤)²⁶ and Li Meng 李孟.²⁷ As Ayurbarwarda left for Shangdu after his enthronement, he ordered Temüder to oversee Dadu, demonstrating his confidence in Temüder. Later, in 1312, the emperor also granted Temüder's ancestors various honorary titles and commissioned the composition of the eulogies we examined above.²⁸

During this first service as the Senior Chief Councilor of the Central Secretariat, Temüder initiated a series of reforms centered on administrative discipline, enhancing the security of the emperor, and consolidating the power of the central government. In 1312, Temüder submitted a memorial emphasizing how he strived to fix problems within the government. He also criticized the incompetence of a significant number of officials who had relied on "luck" to gain their positions, and requested their dismissal. In another memorial, he insisted on heightened security on the emperor's travel from Dadu to Shangdu.²⁹ Two months later, he insisted that the darugachis of appanages granted to the imperial princes should be appointed by the central government rather than the princes themselves.³⁰

One month later, Ayurbarwarda issued an edict ordering that 1,073 jing 頃 of land from Guide 歸德 and Baozhou 亳州 (modern-day Henan), previously granted to a "Bulianjidai" by Emperor Möngke, should be returned to his "sons and grandsons,"³¹ probably including Temüder. Although this suggests that the emperor was pleased with Temüder's suggestions, soon afterwards, in early 1313, Temüder voluntarily left the government due to health reasons.³² One year later, in 1314, Temüder returned to the central government on the recommendation of Councilor Hasan (Ch. Hasan 哈散), receiving from the emperor the honorific title of the Most Honored (kaifu yitong sansi 開府儀同三司), in addition to the title of Chief Compiler of the Dynastic History (jianxiu guoshi 監修國史)³³ and Overseer of Important Military and Political Affairs (lu junguo zhongshi 錄軍國重事). Later in the same year, he returned to the position of Senior Chief Councilor to the Central Secretariat,³⁴ while Hasan remained as the Secretariat's Junior Chief Councilor.

Upon his return in 1314, Temüder submitted a long list of proposals for reform. The items in the proposal can be classified into the following four categories³⁵:

- 1) A systemization of governmental procedures based on the Central Secretariat, targeting especially unofficial personnel or palace attendants (neishi 內侍) who did not follow standard procedures.
- 2) Increased control over non-governmental trading activities, resulting in the updated regulations on maritime trade of 1314.³⁶ These targeted unofficial trading activities that Temüder argued enabled merchants to evade taxation, increase prices on imported goods, and profit through usury.
- 3) A governmental advance purchase of salt certificates and iron smelting equipment in Shandong 山東 and Hejian 河間 (modern-day Hebei province) to deal with the expected increases in expenses.
- 4) A comprehensive land survey in Jiangzhe 江浙, Jiangdong 江東, and Jianxi 江西, especially targeting the lands of imperial princes, sons-in-laws, and institutions dedicated to religion or education.³⁷

³² See Song 1976: 2818, 4580; on the unlikely possibility of Temüder being dismissed, see Yu 2007: 1063.

³⁴ Song 1976: 566.

³⁵ Song 1976: 4577–4578.

³⁶ Fang 2001: 533–538.

³⁷ Temüder's focus on seeking new sources of taxation served as an alternative to the other possibilities, such as raising taxes, introducing new forms of taxation, or expanding the issue of paper bills, all of which he rejected.

Because of the breadth and sophistication of these reforms, some scholars have questioned whether Temüder deserved credit for all of them.³⁸ Yet, as we had seen above, Temüder himself had first-hand experience in Jiangxi, one of the areas proposed for the land survey, and his wide-ranging administrative experience would have helped him understand the problems addressed in these proposals. Even if these reforms do not all bear the direct hand of Temüder himself, there is no doubt that he was aware of these issues, and willing to propose them in his name.

Not all of Temüder's reforms can be considered successful. His fiscal reforms centered on the land surveys backfired as they caused a revolt led by a "local bandit" named Cai Wujiu 蔡五九, who temporarily occupied Tingzhou 汀州 (modern-day Jiangzhe) and declared himself king. The Yuan government quickly suppressed the rebellion, pacifying the region within two months,³⁹ but not only did the emperor abandon the land survey, he also granted numerous land tax breaks to various regions in the following years. Moreover, this failure left Temüder with a bad reputation, as officials continuously criticized this attempt, even after his death.⁴⁰ The results of his other reform proposals, however, are not specified in the sources.

Despite the failure of some of his proposals, Temüder's position within the government was not necessarily threatened, as he remained Senior Chief Councilor of the Central Secretariat. There were, however, some administrative changes. One year after these proposals, in 1315, Temüder requested that the tasks of the Central Secretariat be divided among its various officials, delegating various responsibilities to different individuals. The officials assigned to these tasks were an interesting mix of both Temüder's supporters and his later enemies.⁴¹

Neither the redistribution of responsibilities nor his own partial failure brought Temüder down. In fact, later in 1315, in addition to all his previous positions, Temüder was appointed to oversee the affairs of the Bureau of Tibetan and Buddhist Affairs (xuanzhengyuan 宣政院), an office that not only dealt with Buddhists but also supervised some of the Tibetan territories. Three months later, he was granted the honorific title of Grand Preceptor (taishi 太師) on the order of the Empress Dowager Targi,⁴² and in the following month became the de facto head of the High Court for Mongols (dazongzhengfu 大宗正府).⁴³ This was the height of Temüder's career, as he simultaneously headed multiple high-level governmental agencies. However, what Temüder exactly accomplished with all this authority from 1315 to 1317 is unclear in the sources.

A round of new policies following a change in regime is by no means a new thing. The reforms initiated and conducted by Temüder remain significant, however, even compared to other reforms in the Yuan dynasty. First and foremost, Temüder centered his reforms on fixing problems from the previous era, the reign of Qaishan. Qaishan's rule was plagued with an unorganized rapid growth of the bureaucracy – most visible through the controversial expansion of the Department of State Affairs (shangshusheng 尚書省) – and suffered from financial problems including the inflation caused by the introduction of new bills and coins.⁴⁴ It is no surprise that Temüder's policies focused on strengthening and reestablishing the authority and functionality of the Central Secretariat and also seeking new sources of governmental revenues while rejecting suggestions to raise taxes or increase the circulation of paper bills. Second, it was Temüder himself, a third-generation Mongol, who single-handedly spearheaded these reforms, not a hired non-Mongol – such as Ahmad (? – 1282) or Sangha (? – 1291) during the reign of Qubilai⁴⁵ or the Uyghur Toghto under Qaishan. Temüder's sole control over, and centrality to, the reforms arguably caused contemporary and later individuals to regard him as a dictator, but the significance of his reforms or the fact that a Mongol himself led the reform deserves more attention.

5 Fall, return, and the end of an era

In the last seven years of his life (1315–1322), Temüder experienced both ups and downs. He lost power in 1317, but returned to prominence after Emperor Ayurbarwarda's demise in 1320, initiating another round of reforms. He gradually lost power again, however, ending his controversial life without much impact. His sons never reclaimed the honor and authority of their father.

The first attack against Temüder occurred in 1315. Zhang Gui 張桂, a military commander active since Qubilai's reign who had climbed all the way to the posts of Assistant Director of the Bureau of Military Affairs (shumifushi 樞密副使) and Privy Councilor, was the first to openly criticize Temüder, claiming that he was unqualified for the position of the Grand Preceptor. In response, the Empress Dowager Targi issued her own edict summoning Zhang Gui and had him beaten, forcing him to leave the capital due to injuries from this punishment.⁴⁶ Zhang Gui alone could not take Temüder down.

The second and more critical attack occurred two years later, in 1317. Vice Censor-in-Chief (yushi zhongcheng 御史中丞) Yang Dorji, Senior Vice Councilor of the Secretariat Xiao Baiju, and Protector of the Capital (liushou 留守) He Sheng 賀勝⁴⁷ led the accusations against Temüder. The long list of Temüder's wrongdoings included receiving bribes from various people, confiscating lands illegally, harassing officials for his own benefit, and appointing his allegedly incompetent sons to high-ranking positions. More than forty officials from both the central and local government jointly submitted this document. Ayurbarwarda was enraged and ordered Temüder's arrest. Fleeing and hiding at a place near the residence of the Empress Dowager, Temüder avoided further punishment, thanks to the Empress Dowager's protection, but still lost all his official positions.⁴⁸

Within two years of his dismissal, Temüder returned to power in 1319, being appointed Grand Preceptor for the Heir Apparent (taizi taishi 太子太師), serving the future Emperor Shidebala. Yet again, a group of officials within the Censorate, this time led by Vice Censor-in-Chief Zhao Shiyan 趙世延, immediately attempted to impeach him. Once more, due to the Empress Dowager's support, Temüder retained this single position, but he was unable to recover any of his former appointments. The efforts of the censorial officials to block his influence in the government were thus partially successful.⁴⁹

Temüder reclaimed power during the peaceful transition from Emperor Ayurbarwarda to Shidebala in 1320. There were, however, significant challenges and tensions among the higher-ranking officials. First, when Ayurbarwarda passed away, the Empress Dowager Targi again appointed Temüder as Senior Chief Councilor to the Secretariat. Then Temüder launched a series of attacks against his former enemies. Within 1320, Temüder certainly removed a significant number of his political opponents.⁵⁰ The purge that took place in the transition period was by no means limited to Temüder's enemies, however, as the emperor also executed some of Temüder's former allies, who were accused of treason.⁵¹ The first was Hasan, the former Junior Chief Councilor of the Secretariat who had recommended Temüder's return to the Central Secretariat in 1314. The second was the Head of the Dowager Empress's Bureau (huizhengyuan 徽政院), Shiremün (Ch. shiliemen 失烈門), who had previously cooperated with Temüder in purging Xiao Baiju and Yang Dorji.

After everything had settled down, Temüder held onto his high rank. Again multiple honorary titles were bestowed on him, such as the Most Honored, Supreme Pillar of the State (shangzhuguo 上柱國), Grand Preceptor,⁵² and later the title of Grand Marshal (taiwei 太尉).⁵³ The emperor even issued an edict to build a stele to commemorate Temüder's ancestors.⁵⁴ Later, in 1321, he was once again appointed to oversee the Bureau of Tibetan and Buddhist Affairs.⁵⁵

With these positions in hand, Temüder again introduced a series of reforms that were broadly consistent with those he had proposed during Ayurbarwarda's reign. The first fiscal reform he initiated in 1320, immediately after returning to office, focused on examining the granary reserves and implementing stricter control on tax collection.⁵⁶ He also initiated administrative reforms to strengthen his control over governmental affairs.⁵⁷ There is no sign, however, of policies as drastic or significant as those introduced during Ayurbarwarda's reign, perhaps due to Shidebala's shorter rule.

The end of Temüder's life was rather uneventful. With most of his enemies gone, nobody attempted open criticism. He had also established close connections with the emperor himself when Shidebala was heir apparent, and Targi, still powerful, now Grand Empress Dowager, remained his ally. However, Temüder's biography says that Emperor Shidebala gradually came to recognize Temüder's wrongdoing and shifted his trust toward the newly appointed Junior Chief Councilor of the Central Secretariat, Baiju (1298–1323), a descendant of Chinggis Khan's famous general, Muqali.⁵⁸ Baiju slowly but surely distanced Temüder from the emperor. Unlike many of the Yuanshi's so-called treacherous ministers, Temüder died of natural causes in 1322,⁵⁹ and Empress Targi also passed away in 1322. Posthumous disgrace followed soon after. In 1323, on the basis of detailed reports of his wrongdoing submitted by the officials of the Censorate, the emperor retracted Temüder's official positions and ordered the destruction of the stele built to commemorate his ancestors.⁶⁰

Temüder had five sons, all of whom met different ends. One of them, named *Bars-jisu (Ch. Balajisi 八思吉思), was appointed Director of the Bureau of Tibetan and Buddhist Affairs (xuanzhengyuan shi 宣政院使), but was later executed for receiving bribes in 1322.⁶¹ In 1323, another son, *Baldan (Ch. Bandan 班丹), who was the Overseer of the Bureau of Military Affairs (zhi shumiyuan shi 知樞密院事) was beaten and dismissed for the same reason, and never returned to the government.⁶² These persecutions against his brothers must have made another son, a Secretarial Censor (zhishu shiyushi 治書侍御史) named *Sonom (Ch. Suonan 鎖南), anxious. It is thus not surprising that he ended up joining the coup led by *Tegshi (Ch. Tieshi 鐵失) in murdering the Emperor Shidebala at Nanpo 南坡 (located thirty li south of Shangdu) in 1323, or at least was easily targeted for this accusation.⁶³ However, *Sonom, like others accused of participating, was later executed by the newly crowned Yisün Temür (r. 1323–1328). Two other sons, *Soju (Ch. Suozhu 鎖住) and *Guwainnu (Ch. Guanyinnu 觀音奴), survived until 1330, when they faced an investigation for making amulets and conducting cursing rituals, which probably led to their execution.⁶⁴

6 Conclusion: the significance of the “treacherous minister”

What does this examination of Temüder, his ancestors, and sons tell us about the Mongols in the early fourteenth century? To start with, Temüder’s life highlights the transformation and adaptation of Mongol elites. Temüder’s ancestors all established themselves as military leaders from the birth of the Mongol Empire onward. However, the lives of Temüder’s uncle *Qulu Buqa and Temüder himself demonstrate how the ruling Mongols expanded their expertise into civil administration. Moreover, Temüder did not acquire his administrative skills from nowhere – before his prominence in the 1310s and 1320s, he had accumulated experience in various positions in the central and local government, experience that enabled him to initiate reforms that his ancestors could not have imagined.

Admittedly, Temüder himself was by no means the only third- or fourth-generation Mongol who served as an administrative expert in the 14th-century Mongol rule over China. Other officials of similar heritage, such as Baiju, replaced Temüder in the final years of Ayurbarwada’s reign. However, in the process of emphasizing the diversity of the Mongols who truly were praiseworthy for recruiting individuals from various backgrounds to administer the empire, we easily neglect the transformation of the Mongol elites themselves. Broadly speaking, our understanding of Mongols has changed from seeing them as merely exploitative nomads to people more versed in hiring those capable of sophisticated imperial administration. Temüder, among others, stands as an example of the Mongols themselves being capable administrators.⁶⁵

Nevertheless, why is Temüder depicted in such negative terms, both by his contemporaries and in later scholarship? Most importantly, Temüder’s negative image fits into the dichotomy of the Han versus non-Han narrative, a simplistic but problematic approach that has existed since the fourteenth century and was reinforced later. The idea that Temüder represented the nomadic steppe culture, in contrast to the Han-Chinese culture represented by Li Meng (famous for advocating the restoration of the civil service exam) has a rather long history. The Yuanshi biography of Li Meng reads, “Concerning the Huangqing 皇慶 (1312–1313) and

Yanyou 延祐 (1314–1320) eras, for every failure in politics, people always said it was due to Temüder; for every success, people attributed it to Li Meng.”⁶⁶ This Han versus non-Han perspective also over-emphasizes the factional dispute between the two as an uncontrollable force that continued since the transition from the militaristic figure of Qaishan to the more civically aligned reigns of Ayurbarwarda and Shidebala, and continued to the coup at Nanpo, where a faction of Mongols, inaccurately connected to Temüder, murdered the Emperor Shidebala himself.⁶⁷

This binary approach does not conform to what actually happened, however. From the very beginning of Ayurbarwarda’s reign, Li Meng and Temüder collaborated in the reform process. In fact, some of Li Meng’s own reform proposals, such as the emphasis on centralization and keeping in check non-governmental bodies (including, but not limited to, imperial princes and religious groups), were also consistent with Temüder’s policies. Although the two later had disagreements, and Temüder eventually advocated the ouster of Li Meng, this later conflict should not eclipse what they had previously accomplished together.⁶⁸ Moreover, some of the officials who spearheaded Temüder’s dismissal in the late 1310s – Yang Dorji, Xiao Baizhu, and Zhao Shiyan – were of Tangut, Kitan, and Onggüt descent respectively, indicating that the factional conflict was not simply between Han and non-Han. Finally, the connection between the officials who led the Nanpo coup and Temüder is, at best, questionable. Temüder was both dead and posthumously disgraced before the coup occurred, and the four of his sons who did not take part in it were not affected and survived the aftermath of the coup.

Second, Temüder has an image as an unusual, unchecked, and all-powerful dictator. This image is also questionable. Temüder’s rise to power, which was based on his family background, keshig training, and accumulated administrative experience, followed a common route for reaching high office and should not be considered anomalous.⁶⁹ He did benefit from a close connection to the Empress Dowager Targi, and although the authority and influence that Mongol noblewomen held within the Mongol-Yuan Empire was obviously significant,⁷⁰

⁶⁶ Song 1976: 4090.

⁶⁷ This approach was seemingly emphasized early on by Xiao Gongqin and adopted in Hsiao Ch’i-ch’ing’s seminal work (Xiao 1983; Hsiao 1994).

⁶⁸ For the details of Li Meng’s proposals and his dismissal due to Temüder’s opposition, see Song 1976: 4087–4090.

this alone does not explain Temüder's rise to power. Moreover, Temüder's power was held in check. In 1317, he was dismissed for corruption, and even when he returned a year later his role was limited to tutoring the heir apparent. Later, during Shidebala's reign, the Junior Chief Councilor of the Central Secretariat, Baiju, became more influential as Temüder's authority in the court gradually weakened until his death in 1322.

In sum, the examination of Temüder's career sheds light on an under-appreciated aspect of the Mongol elites in the Yuan dynasty – the transformation of the Mongols themselves. A descendant of military leaders who became an experienced civil servant and a determined fiscal and centralized reformer, Temüder might not have been a contemporary favorite, yet his story is an enlightening example of how the elite Mongols changed their roles, gaining new expertise to further advance their rule of China. It thus provides a more holistic and nuanced understanding of this period.
