The Swiss programme on Ethnic Radio 3EA (1224 kHz on your dial) can always be heard on the last Wednesday of each month, at 10 a.m. and at 9 p.m. We recently lost our French speaker for many years, Philippe Mülethaler, who moved to Perth, but gained a very capable replacement in his place, Marcel Bouler. exciting beginning. As for your Club, the Committee will organise a host of functions and generate new ideas.

Let us get together for a start on 2nd March to get to know each other better. Why not come early for dinner? We shall organise a couple of Swiss films, but the prevailing motto for the evening will be "Know your fellow-member". Why not bring along one or two prospective new members?

Let us make this our best year ever by attending as many functions as possible, by giving the Committee some of your talents and assistance to make our get-togethers more exciting. This is the year of analysing and investigating the idea of our own Club-house.

No need to advertise our lodge in Jindabyne amongst those who have been there — it continues to be popular.

At present, our regular Club night is still Monday at the Concordia Club in Stanmore. Why not come along and enjoy good fellowship and a game of Jass? It is also the night when the Alphorn group and the Yodlers are rehearsing — you will never be lonely.

May I conclude this message by hoping to personally meet you at as many functions as possible and to see our Club fulfill its objective to unite the members in friendship by upholding Swiss culture and traditions.

Yours sincerely,

Peter Meury, President.

On a recent postal match, the team of S.S.B.R.C. achieved a very good placing against top shooters of Australia with a score of 2893 points out of a possible 3000 points.

The team is not going badly in the North Shore Shield Match. Recently the Club bought another rifle, which takes it up to four Club rifles — so, where are all the "Tellenköchter & Sohne".

See you soon.

The Christmas luncheon held on 13th December, at the Travelodge Motel, was a great success, with people coming from the Blue Mountains and beyond to attend.

Guests were welcomed by Mr. Kaspar Vetsch and then enjoyed a very pleasant meal complete with Christmas cookies baked by the ladies.

For the lucky people whose names were drawn, there were lovely gifts, including some of Mrs. Alice Schenk's beautiful pottery.

An after-dinner speech, given by the Consul-General, Mr. R. Tellenbach, rounded off a very enjoyable occasion.

From Agriculture to Industry

In contrast with other continental European countries, Switzerland was prompted to industrialize at a very early stage, because of the inadequacy of her agricultural output. For several centuries she made up for this deficiency by exporting services — mostly of a military nature — which brought her revenue and other forms of income so that, somehow, she could secure the supplies she needed. To this process her commercial exchanges with other countries also contributed.

Industry arose in Switzerland at about the same time as in England and long before other continental states grew out of the stage of handicraft production. By the end of the 18th century, Switzerland was already the most highly industrialized of all continental European nations. She is still in the lead today. According to the definition adopted by the OECD for the compilation of labour statistics, Switzerland, with a ratio of 48.3%, ranks among the first OECD countries as regards the ratio of industrial to total civilian employment.

As for Swiss agriculture, which accounted for 22% of civilian employment before the Second World War, it now occupies only 7% of the labour force, a proportion lower than the corresponding ratio for any continental European country except Belgium.

Beginning with a Dairy Economy

And yet, in the minds of many people, the Swiss are closely associated with agriculture and especially with cheese-making. Swiss cheese having become an item of world-wide repute. But legend is one thing, and really another.

Swiss agriculture is handicapped by the low fertility of the soil and has never been able to meet the calory requirements of the population, so that from time immemorial Swiss peasants have always been impelled to extract from their land a maximum amount of food with a minimum of labour. About 1870 for the first time, farmers ceased to be an absolute majority in the distribution of the economically active part of the population. The farming population of many European countries did not fall below 50% until half a century later.

While the country is linked to the outside world by a close network of trade channels and realtionships, it must be noted that, in the event of disturbances of war, its food supplies would be promptly now become a capital-intensive industry. Between 1939 and 1968, more than half the arable land was amalgamated into larger units more readily accessible and better suited for rational farming. At the same time, motorized equipment increased twelvefold, while the proportion of the labour force employed in agriculture declined very sharply.

In spite of the decline in the number of people employed on the land, agricultural output has increased by 32%. Although the spread of satellite towns has reduced the area under cultivation, independent production — which remains well below domestic requirements and makes any idea of self-sufficiency illusory — has risen sharply as a result of productivity gains.

Average annual milk yields per cow rose from 3,250 kg. in 1961 to 3,680 kg. in 1973. In 1972, a year when everything was being done to boost production, potato yields were 194 quintals per hectare. Potato yields nowadays exceed 370 quintals. In the case of wheat, barley and rye, yeilds have practically doubled since 1942.

The drawbacks inherent in her situation have led Switzerland to rationalize her agricultural system to the maximum. About a quarter of the national territory (i.e. the mountains, lakes, etc.) is not suitable for any type of cultivation. One-fourth is covered with forests. Another fourth is grasslands, mainly of the Alpine type. The rest is meadows and fields. All told, only 6.3% of the total area is suitable for grain crops. This represents a major economic handicap. Indeed, over a given area wheat production yields three times as many calories for human consumption as dairy production. This accounts for the fact that Swiss agriculture is overwhelmingly concerned with dairy production. Milk is plentiful, and as the only method of disposing of it in the past was through processing into cheese that could be marketed abroad, it is this simple economic reality that has made the country famous for cheese.

endangered, the more so as Switzerland is a landlocked country and has no trading partners who could grant her privileged treatment. This basic situation is particularly significant: in terms of calory intake, Swiss agriculture only produces 55% of the national requirements, or 45% if one takes account of the imported feed component of milk and meat production.

The dark years of the Second World War demonstrated to the Swiss the dangers of undue reliance on foreign supplies. And yet, through an intensification of crop cultivation which was made mandatory by law, Switzerland avoided the food shortages which afflicted the rest of Europe.

Since then, agriculture has never ceased expanding. From an essentially labour-intensive industry in former days, it has
