air. It is only the combination of this substance with the nitric oxides from inside Switzerland which results in the real danger to the forests.

It has to be stressed that the emission of nitric oxides has increased considerably during the past few years, whilst the proportion of sulphuric dioxides has decreased, mainly due to the stricter control of heating systems and exhaust fumes.

What is the cycle in the decay of a tree?

Air pollution causes chronic poisoning in a tree, which, at first, is not visible and shows only after some time. The symptom of the sickness as well as the extent of the damage can change through secondary influences, such as vermin or other factors. The trees weakened by immissions are particularly susceptible to parasite epidemics. A tree affected by the bark-beetle drives out completely within a few weeks, though the effect of the vermin is only of secondary importance: all the natural factors generally speed up the development.

What are the consequences of decaying forests in the short and the long term?

In the short term the result is above all financial loss for the owner of the forest, who often is compelled to cut down the whole stand of trees before time and to fight vermin. Long-term damage means avalanches, landslides, climatic changes, shortage of wood etc.

How can these effects be mitigated?

The forestry services traditionally responsible for the woods are fully occupied under the circumstances to establish the damage, to check developments and to cut down the decaying and dead trees; they only fight the symptoms to a large extent. The real fight against the basic cause of the blight must be carried on by the politicians and the people. All measures taken with regard to ecology in whatever field must have the same aim, viz. to reduce air pollution as much as possible in an economically viable manner.

One often hears that scientists are not in a position to prove conclusively that forest decay is connected with air pollution. With this, the delicate question is raised of irrefutable evidence of natural-scientific experiments. Nevertheless, we have a large number of proofs in that direction which at least make it highly probable that the relation as explained is more than justified. We may and must act as quickly as possible, in order to keep any widening of the damage within limits. Interview: ASS/Franzoni

«Très riches Heures du Duc de Berry»

Published by Faksimile-Verlag, Lucerne, 1983

One of the most famous manuscripts in the world, the prayer-book (medieval book of meditation) «Très riches Heures du Duc de Berry», jealously protected at the Château de Chantilly, dates back to 1410-1485. The unique beauty of the paintings made the book world-famous, a beauty hardly achieved again since then. One volume contains the complete facsimile edition with 131 gold-illuminated pictures, as well as numerous manuscripts, a total of 416 pages. This is accompanied by a volume of comment and explanation which present the reader with detailed information on the miniatures (200 pages). The edition is limited to 980 copies. Anyone interested in subscribing to this superb work of art should apply direct to Faksimile-Verlag, Alpenstrasse 5, 6004 Lucerne, Switzerland.
