Headly days for Swiss football. The European Football Championship, Euro 2008, will soon be kicking off. Walter Lutz, editor-in-chief of the "Sport" newspaper for many years, knows Swiss football inside out. He takes a look back, for "Swiss Review", at the greatest achievements of the Swiss national football teams of the past.

The European Football Championship will take centre stage between 7 and 29 June in four Swiss cities (Basle, Berne, Geneva and Zurich) and four Austrian cities with 16 countries involved in 31 matches. The Swiss taxpayer will shoulder the burden for the most expensive sporting event ever held in Switzerland. Whereas the 1954 World Cup was self-financing thanks to support from the Sport-Toto organisation, CHF 182 million of public money will be used to stage this event. The federal government will provide half that amount, essentially the full cost of the security measures. Security is a crucial part of the tournament, but also an Achilles heel. It involves a national operation and means the government will have to take security measures that go far beyond the field of sport. Four hundred to a thousand police officers will mingle with the spectators for each match. Higher demands from UEFA and the plan to set up fan zones for visiting supporters in the cities, where they can watch matches on giant screens, have contributed to escalating costs. Expectations have changed dramatically since 1954. While the Brazilian and Swiss teams of the day stayed alongside one another in Spartan accommodation in the Magglingen sports college – the buildings they used still bear the names of the teams – with minimum comfort, almost like a scout camp, most of the delegations will be staying in five-star hotels this time around.

Switzerland and its football federation (SFV) have contributed enormously to football's global development. When the SFV was founded in 1895, it had to overcome deep-rooted opposition and prejudice from teachers, the Church, the authorities and parents. Switzerland was one of the seven founding members of FIFA, world football's governing body, in 1904. FIFA's headquarters have been in Zurich since 1932. Five Swiss people have run FIFA as General Secretary. Sepp Blatter from Valais has been the head of world football since 1998. Half a century later, UEFA was born in Switzerland, which has been its home for 50 years.

The sun never goes down in FIFA's empire today. Football is the world's most popular sport and attracts the most media attention. Two hundred and eight countries with over 250 million active footballers belong to FIFA. Thirty-two billion TV viewers watched the 2006 World Cup. Being simpler than any other, football is the number one sport. The small number of rules (17) seem to have been set in stone. They form the only set of laws in the world, which apply to all languages, races, cultures, rich and poor, young and old, and the illiterate and the educated, and they must be adhered to by people of all political systems and ideologies, with no ifs and buts.

Despite the fact that the game only became professional relatively late in Switzerland, Swiss footballers have enjoyed remarkable success on the pitch. Switzerland was one of the great footballing nations for 32 years (1934–1966), when no other country, except Brazil, could better the six times Switzerland qualified for the World Cup finals during this period.

The series of incredible performances by the Swiss amateur team began at the Olympic tournament in Paris in 1924. They returned home as European champions. This tournament, held six years before the first World Cup, is seen as the birth of international football. This is because in Uruguay a tournament featured a South American team for the first time. The Swiss team travelled to Paris by train with a return ticket valid for only 10 days. All the players had worked up until two days before the first match and were back in work two days after the final. Every member of the team had taken unpaid holiday. Success in the six matches caused unimaginable levels of excitement back home. It made football popular overnight in Switzerland. Newspapers dedicated extra pages to a sporting event for the first time and in the corridors of the Federal Parliament they were saying: "The

Switzerland enjoyed new highs 14 years later in 1938. On 21 May, Switzerland became one of the first European teams to beat England with a 2-1 victory in Zurich. And on 9 June, Switzerland achieved its most spectacular success to date at the World Cup finals in Paris. A few weeks after Austria became part of Hitler's empire, the Swiss beat the great German team of the day 4-2 in a replay after a 1-1 draw. Never before and never again would a football match find such resonance in Switzerland on account of the tense political situation back then. Extra sports pages, match reports on the front pages, even of the NZZ, victory parades, messages of congratulations from the Federal Council and Parliament – the win still goes down as the most significant in Swiss footballing history. Before the second match, the "Völkischer Beobachter" newspaper, Hitler's mouthpiece, mockingly warned the Swiss: "Sixty million Germans will be playing against Switzerland in Paris!" After the match, the "Sport" in Zurich sarcastically replied: "We were playing against 60 million Germans, but we only needed eleven players."

On three more occasions Swiss national teams have pulled off famous victories at World Cup tournaments. The Swiss knocked the Italians out of the tournament in 1954 in Switzerland in two momentous matches.

Then in 1994 in the USA and in 2006 in Germany the Swiss progressed at least past the group stages.

What made the 1924, 1938, 1954, 1994 and 2006 teams so strong? All these teams benefited from diversity in language, race and culture and from different approaches to the game. The teams were made up of players from different parts of Switzerland drawing on a combination of Swiss characteristics. They blended German-Swiss endeavour with Latin temperament. Half the players in these teams came from German-speaking Switzerland and the other half from the French-speaking part. And in the 1954 team, arguably the strongest of all, there were nine French speakers. A similar approach has been adopted in recent years, with the inclusion of second and third generation foreigners in the national team.

The European Championship will raise excitement levels to fever pitch. An army of more than 30,000 Swiss fans invaded Germany two years ago to support their team at the World Cup finals. Football fever meant that many teams could not cope with the surge of young players signing up. There are more than 242,793 active footballers in Switzerland today and around 60% of them play in youth teams. And there are 80 Swiss professionals playing abroad. Many of these are squad players, though, rather than first-team regulars. This factor and the large number of injured players have to be taken into account when weighing up the team's prospects at this latest tournament under the management of Köbi Kuhn. Though some dreamers are talking up their team's chances, Switzerland are highly unlikely to become European champions.

"The Swiss team can go all the way"

Will Köbi Kuhn's team shine at Euro 2008? The success of a football team depends on more than the ability of its players. The former Swiss international Umberto Barberis looks at the Swiss team's chances. Interview by Alain Wey.

SWISS REVIEW: What do you make of Köbi Kuhn's tactics?

UMBERTO BARBERIS: He has got it spot on. It's a shame that he's retiring after this tournament. He'll of course be dreaming of going out on a high. I believe he will do everything possible to ensure the team performs at its best. In tournaments such as these the early results are often decisive: they can give the team the required momentum and get the fans behind them. Rationality has very little to do with it. As regards the build-up, you have to take into account that we qualified automatically as one of the host nations. As a result, there are lots of factors that Köbi Kuhn cannot influence. Over the past year his team has played lots of friendly matches that he has no doubt taken very seriously: Given that the matches had nothing to do with qualification, however, the players themselves will have been focused in part on their club football.

I often got the impression that when the Swiss team went ahead, they became over-confident and stopped giving their all. Their game dropped off, exposing weaknesses that the opposition frequently exploited with great success. Is that because these were friendly matches, or does it go deeper than that?

I don't see it that way. The team looks good in defence when everyone plays defensively, but we don't possess the qualities of the Italians, as the art of defending requires a great deal of precision. Defending without making errors requires a great deal of class. The Swiss team attacks, puts the opposition under pressure, and as soon as they have scored a goal, sometimes even against weaker teams, they try to hold onto their lead. This is still a rather Swiss approach, but they do it much better than they did before. You've always got to put yourself in the opposition's shoes. If you go 1-0 down against Switzerland, you change your tactics. If the team has played well in the first half, the tempo can drop off in the second half, but that does not necessarily have anything to do with over-confidence.

Are Switzerland difficult to play against?

Yes, very difficult. Especially for countries like Italy and France, who do not like playing against Switzerland. Switzerland are not such a tough proposition for the Spanish, the Portuguese or the Germans, as they know we have little chance against them if they play to their systems. By contrast, we have caused Italy and France serious problems in recent years. They switch from their usual formation when they play Switzerland. When making comparisons, you can't just look at things from a Swiss perspective. You have to look at the opposition, their style, how they approach matches and how the tournament is progressing.

What are the strengths of the Swiss team?

It has a lot of spirit. Köbi Kuhn has been working on developing team spirit for several years, and the supporters have responded well to that. Perhaps it was a little less evident in the most recent friendly matches, but the Swiss do genuinely have team spirit. The sponsors and the fans wouldn't give their support unless they believed in the team. There is a good atmosphere in the camp. With the European Championships just around the corner, however, the Swiss media is being hyper-critical of the team. If you want to be one of the top eight footballing nations in Europe, then of course you have to perform at the very highest level. Switzerland still has a lot to prove, but it has already achieved great things. It's only to be expected that from time to time it will quite simply be outclassed by other countries such as Germany. There are no miracles, you simply have to play exceptionally well.

What about Switzerland's other strengths?

I believe Switzerland's greatest strength is as a unit. We have a few outstanding individuals, but not many. There is Alex Frei, but we've seen little of him this year. He is a player who can turn matches. And there's Ludovic Magnin, who when he puts his mind to it can completely change a match, as he can
