AMERICA

In America, the ICRC carried out little fresh activity in 1957. It maintained excellent relations with the Governments and National Societies, either directly ² or through its resident delegates ³.

In addition, the International Committee continued its endeavours to secure the ratification and dissemination of the Geneva Conventions and to publicize the basic principles and the activity of the Red Cross in the international field.

The ICRC also had useful discussions with the presidents and secretaries-general of several National Red Cross Societies who visited Geneva. During these meetings, consideration was given to legal, financial or technical questions which are of common interest.

The ICRC did its utmost to ease the task of the National Red Cross Societies and to assist their efforts, particularly in the case of internal disturbances.

Lastly, the Latin American countries were kept informed of the ICRC activities by means of radio broadcasts in Spanish by the International Committee ⁴.
