What topics occupy the Swiss "Man in the Street?"

Charity from the husband?

Who is "minister of finance" in the Swiss home? Who manages the household budget? Is the wife still dependent on her husband's charity, or has she now progressed to equal financial partnership?

The 'Market Research Institute' in Lucerne issued a questionnaire which shows the following results: 29% of couples have a joint account. One quarter of the wives receive a stable sum of household money. 31% of the housewives administer the entire income. The husband has his quota of pocket money. These answers were evident from 607 completed questionnaire forms; four representative-and-typical completed questionnaires were published and quoted in news media.—

Mrs Meyer-Andre (66), housewife, Biel:

"My husband (70) still works. I do the household and am in charge of our cash earnings. I first attend to the firm's commitments and the remainder is used for routine shopping and irregular oddments. My husband cannot be bothered to manage our finances himself and prefers to have pocket money. In our 42 years of marriage we are well satisfied with our arrangement and would do it again a second time."

Mr Enrico Franzoni (52), president of the Swiss National Council, Muralto, Ticinese:

"I am the sole breadwinner. My wife (34) receives a definite amount of money each month. It is for all household and all of her personal expenses. Formerly she had no allowance at all and needed to ask me for every trifle. This is now a thing of the past, except when we are on vacation when I pay our total expenses."

Our bank account is a joint one; for this to work well is purely a question of good faith."

Mrs Gerda Konzetti (38), employed at T.V. and Radio Station, Allschwil:

"My husband works in a chemical factory. I receive a monthly, definite sum for car, household and rent expenses. The actual household expenses are shared between us. My husband is quite indulgent, but if he is broke at times he says so and I jump into the breach. A pocket money problem does not exist as we are both wage earners."

Mr Alexander Seiter (60), bank manager, Biel:

"My wife is housewife only. As I work in a bank I do not deal with cash. My wife (60) receives a monthly, fixed amount of money with which she pays house rent, shopping and small necessities. Should the allowance be insufficient, which as yet never was the case, then my account would be at my wife's disposal. As for myself, I have no need for regular pocket money. Our two daughters, now grown up, also always received everything they needed." —Documentation: Stefan Thomi (Schweizer Illustrierte)
