With the ever increasing number of supermarkets, everyone predicted the end of the local corner stores.

In 1970 Switzerland had over 14000 groceries, today there are only 5500 left with a further 2000 expected to close shop over the next few years. Although the eventual demise of all small grocery stores was predicted 25 years ago, they are not only still here, but suddenly they are making a slow but steady comeback. The recent recession has also accelerated the demand from unemployed people who are prepared to run these shops which demand long hours of work for relatively small returns.

Some shoppers are getting tired of the super-supermarkets, their impersonal service, their long waiting queues at the exits and their absence of specialities. Gradually some people are returning to the old grocery stores for their shopping. They are looking again for a personal contact, for individual attention, for a little chat with the neighbours who you meet in the store and, for many elderly people, for the free delivery at home which they were missing at the supermarkets.

Mobile shops are becoming more popular too. People appreciate it again to be able to shop right outside their apartments and houses rather than having to take the car to go to the faraway supermarket. So there still seems to be some future for the small grocery stores in Switzerland.

ZUG EXPORTS ITS RUBBISH

All the refuse produced by the canton of Zug is kindly sent to an incinerator in Winterthur under a mutual agreement which is to last until the year 2000. But Zug must take back at least 20% of the dross and cinders left over from the burning.

The authorities of the canton of Zug are very happy with the arrangement as it costs them less to send the rubbish to Winterthur than to dispose of it in their own canton. A somewhat funny side to the story is that under the new Swiss law, Value Added Tax (VAT) must be paid on this transaction. How much Added Value can you put onto a heap of rubbish?
