SWISS FIRMS PROVIDE MORE JOBS, BUT NOT IN SWITZERLAND

Altogether, the 50 biggest employers in Switzerland have created last year 22,000 new jobs in foreign countries (in 1994 it was 52,000 new jobs). At the same time, they reduced the number of working places in Switzerland by 8,000.

This trend has been going on now for several years and it is of course due to the high costs of living and high salaries in Switzerland compared with much lower wages and operating costs in foreign countries.

How about transferring a few businesses from Switzerland to New Zealand? There is plenty of space here and an abundance of clean, fresh rain water if we judge by the wettest winter we ever had.....

VELOSOLEX 50 YEARS OLD

Most of you will probably remember this famous French invention, half bicycle, half motorbike, that was the rage all over Europe just after the 2nd World War.

The first Velosolex came off the assembly line near Paris in 1946 and in no time it became a way of life for over 5 million delighted owners who found in their Velosolex a chance to move around in the most economical way possible at a time when cars were either inexistent or far too expensive to purchase.

Powered by a small engine sitting on top of the front wheel, the Velosolex could move at a maximum speed of 30km per hour and, on steep hills, the engine often needed some welcome human pedal-power to master the climb.

After its glory years in the 1960's the Velosolex rapidly lost its appeal as people became more affluent and cars became more plentiful and cheaper. But strangely enough, the Velosolex is still alive. It has left its home near Paris and is now being manufactured in Hungary from where small numbers are still being exported to Switzerland and, not entirely surprisingly, back to its country of origin, France.
