Visit to the Maritime Museum in San Diego

Euterpe Star of India

A little over a year ago, on our way home from a well deserved Swiss holiday, we stopped over in America to visit friends and family. While in San Diego, we visited the Maritime Museum and came across a very interesting, old sailing ship – the Star of India. I was absolutely fascinated reading about the voyages she made across the world, especially since her main destination was New Zealand. From all the photographs and diary entries they exhibited, it must have been an incredibly hard and boring journey to immigrate in those days.

The Star of India is the world's oldest still active sailing ship. She began her life on the Isle of Man in 1863 and used to be called Euterpe. In 1871, she was purchased by the Shaw Savill Line of London and embarked on a quarter century of hauling emigrants to New Zealand, sometimes also touching Australia. She made 21 journeys from Hamburg and London to New Zealand. Her fastest trip took 100 days (one way!), the longest taking 143 days. It was rugged voyaging, with the ship battling through terrific gales.

Passing the Time

Euterpe Times Newspaper

Fourteen issues of the Euterpe Times were published aboard the Euterpe enroute to New Zealand from Aug. 11-Dec. 24, 1879. This handwritten newspaper was created by passengers, with Stead Ellis as the primary creator and Joshua Charlesworth as the scribe. The newspapers featured commentary, poetry, sporting news, pertinent information on topics of natural history, geography and local news.

The life aboard was especially hard on the emigrants cooped up in her tween deck, fed a terribly poor diet and subject to sea sickness and a lot of other illnesses (and rat infestations!). It is astonishing that their death rate was so low. They were a tough lot and most went on to prosper in New Zealand. Thousands of New Zealanders today are descended from the handful of gritty pioneers who braved the high seas on the Euterpe from 1872 – 1897.

- Chief cabin fare: 52-78 Pounds (1 pig, 1 sheep & 12 hens per passenger)
- Second class: 25 Pounds (soup, ham, fish, barley & cheese)
- Steerage Berth: 16-20 Pounds (left overs...)

Who knows, maybe one of your ancestors arrived in New Zealand on the Euterpe?

This is the oldest photo we could find of Swiss living in New Zealand. It's been taken in 1932 at a Swiss Ball in Kaponga. Ida Bernold is "Helvetia" in a play they performed in Taranaki. This photo was published in the "Neue Zürcher Zeitung" on 31st July 1977 along with a double page article on Swiss in New Zealand to celebrate the 25th Jubilee of the Taranaki Swiss Club.
