“Hilaria”: On the Historical Meaning of a Pagan Celebration Mentioned in Land of Israel Midrashim

by *Emmanuel Friedheim

In 1901 Isidore Lévy showed that the Talmudic literature is the only extant broad literature of Semitic origin from the first centuries CE, and that at times it indicates how people of Semitic-Eastern descent viewed Gentile culture, while we usually learn of the various Gentile practices from the Graeco-Roman literature. According to Lévy, the Talmudic literature provides a view of cultural contents, especially in regard to pagan cults, that differs from, and complements, that of the classical literature.¹ The study of the Rabbinical knowledge of the Graeco-Roman and Eastern religious cultures has advanced greatly in recent years, and demonstrates the Rabbis' extensive knowledge of all aspects of the life and rites of the Gentiles.² The Rabbis were cognizant of many pagan festivals, and numerous scholarly proposals have been raised regarding the Halakhic thought behind the Rabbis' rulings on questions pertaining to these holidays, in light of the historical changes that marked the late Second Temple period and the time of the Mishnah and Talmud.³ Saul Lieberman argued in one of his studies that numerous details of pagan practices and much information regarding the heathens themselves are scattered throughout the Rabbinic literature;⁴ we seek to analyze one of these details, from the historical reality, that has been untouched by scholarly research, and attempt to thereby expand the study of the Rabbis' knowledge pertaining to the worship of foreign gods.

The Land of Israel Amoraim used the Greek term hilaria (ἡλάρια), as is taught in the midrashic work Shir ha-Shirim Rabba:

R. Johanan expounded a Scriptural verse regarding Israel before [the Revelation at] Mount Sinai: The flock that stood at Mount Sinai were not standing באלירא⁵ [באילריא]; [rather, they stood] "behind your veil [le-šamatekh" (Cant.

4:1), for they would confine themselves regarding each divine utterance, and would not stand in Hilaria, but rather in awe, trembling, and sweat.⁶

And in another Amoraic teaching:

Another comment: Why were Israel "enclosed" for solemn assembly for an additional day?⁷ Rav said: By what parable may the question be answered? By that of a king to whom came a [formal] occasion for rejoicing, during which his tenants arrived and accorded him honour, and the people in his household arrived and accorded him honour. To all these the matron kept hinting, saying: "Now, while the king conducts himself with you during the Hilaria, get at him for satisfaction of your wishes." When they did not see what she was hinting at, the matron pressed the king for an additional day of feasting during which the people might get satisfaction of their wishes from the king. So, too, the Torah keeps hinting to Israel: "Ask for satisfaction of your wishes." How [does the Torah do] so? [The verse prescribing the libations] for the second day [Num. 29:18, uses the wording] ve-niskeihem ["and their libations"]; for the sixth day, u-nesakheha [v. 31, "and its libations"]; and for the seventh day, ke-mišpaṭam [v. 33, "after their ordinance"] - [with the letters mem, yod, and mem in these variants forming the word] mayim [water]. But since they did not see [to what the Torah was hinting, i.e., asking for rain during the Sukkot festival], [the Torah itself] pressed in their behalf for an additional day, the eighth day [= Shemini Ašeret].⁸

Marcus Jastrow defines hilaria as a "day of rejoicing, both private and public; esp. new days of public rejoicings appointed by a new em-

The wording "an occasion for rejoicing" in the exegesis is parallel to hilaria. See also PesK (ed. Mandelbaum, p. 432; trans. based on BRAUDE & KAPSTEIN: "[Additional Piska] from Another Source", 28:8, p. 442): "R. Alexandri said: [In this connection, consider the parable of] a king to whom a [formal] occasion for rejoicing came. During the subsequent seven days of feasting, his matron kept hinting to the people of the palace, saying: 'Now is the time, while the king is occupied with his Hilaria, to get at him for satisfaction of your wishes'; see the textual variants in MANDELBAUM. See also PesR 52:6 (ed. FRIEDMANN, fol. 202b; trans. W. G. BRAUDE, New Haven / London 1968, vol. 2, p. 882): "R. Alexandrai said: In this connection, consider the parable of a king to whom came a [formal] occasion for rejoicing. During the subsequent seven days of feasting, his matron kept hinting to the people of the palace, saying: 'Now is the time, while the king is with his Hilaria, to get at him for satisfaction of your needs'." See MANDELBAUM, n. 9. Arukh, s. v. אֶלְרִיָּא, copied this, and explained, "this means rejoicing". This source, as well, indicates that Hilaria is parallel to the king's rejoicing on his festival.

peror consisting of games, masquerades &c.”⁹ as does Julius Levy in his Talmudic dictionary.¹⁰ Saul Lieberman, following Samuel Krauss, understands the word hilaria / ilroya (אלר[ו]יא / אילריא) in Pesikta de-Rav Kahana slightly differently. He writes: “The intent here is to the celebrations held on holidays designated for rejoicing [τὰ ἑρᾶ] ἰλάρια, and the exegete uses this word here in reference to Sukkot and Shemini Atzeret, ‘the time of our rejoicing’, as Krauss fundamentally observed in his dictionary, in the entry Hilaria, p. 58”.¹¹ It therefore seems that this term and its parallels in the Rabbinic literature are indicative of an extremely joyous event celebrated by Gentiles in the Talmudic period, one that was marked by frivolity, excessive merrymaking, and revelry.¹² Krauss and Lieberman maintain that these celebrations were conducted on holidays, while Jastrow asserts that this was an imperial observance accompanied by games and the like. These scholars, however, did not indicate any historical source attesting to the observance of this festival, neither in an imperial context nor in any defined celebratory setting, except for Krauss, who notes that this was observed by the Romans on March 25 (which is an important point that we will discuss below). Even Krauss, however, makes no attempt to understand the rhetorical and historical meaning implicit in these exegetical references to the Gentile holiday. Rav, R. Johanan, R. Eleazar ben Pedat, and R. Alexandri, who used this term, were active in the Land of Israel during the course of the third century. To what pagan event, then, did the term hilaria refer? Or, in other words, can we identify the Hilaria festival among the pagan rites conducted in the Land of Israel during this period, or, perhaps, understand the exegetes' use of this term?¹³ As we shall see, the sources and the studies of these rites suggest three possible contexts, and by the process of elimination we shall attempt to indicate the most likely one.

1. “Hilaria” – the Greek context:

The Hilaria festival mentioned in Pesikta de-Rav Kahana was most probably connected with a public, official celebration in which the ruler

רוֹשׁ, or the like. This leads us to assume that the word's philological meaning, and perhaps realistic one, as well, was well known and understood by the Jews in the Land of Israel, and to conclude that this holiday was quite popular during the Talmudic period. It is noteworthy in this context that in the research of Latin and Greek onomastics, the names Hilaeira, Hilarianus, Hilario, Hilarius, and the like were quite common throughout the Roman empire. See, e.g., W. SMITH (ed.), A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, vol. 2, London 1880, pp. 468-72. Epigraphic sources that were discovered in various parts of the Mediterranean basin, such as Aetolia, Epirus, Illyria, Apulia (southern Italy), Cyrenaeca, and many other locations, contain the names Ἰλαρία, Ἰλαριανός, Ἰλαρίνος, Ἰλαρίων, Ἰλαρος. See P. M. FRASER & E. MATTHEWS (eds.), A Lexicon of Greek Personal Names, vol. IIIA, Oxford 1997, pp. 218-19; IDEM, vol. IIIB, Oxford 2000, p. 207. Incidentally, it should be noted that the Ἰλαρία also is mentioned as a personal name in an (undated) Greek inscription uncovered in the baths of Hammat Gader. See L. DI SEGNI, The Greek Inscriptions of Hammat Gader, in: Y. HIRSCHFELD (ed.), The Roman Baths of Hammat Gader, Jerusalem 1997, pp. 218-19 no. 35: Ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις τόποις μνησθῇ Ἰλαρία. Ἡ ὕψατο Συνκλήτιος. Κ(ύρι)ε. εἰσάκουσον, Ἀμήν [“In those holy places may Hilaria be remembered. Syncletius uttered this prayer: hearken, O Lord ! Amen”]; Supplementum Epigraphicum Graecum 47 (1997), p. 608 no. 2016. We also know of the miracles attributed to the Christian Hilarion (291-371), who was born south of Gaza. He disputed with pagans at Maiumas, the port of Gaza, during the Maiumas festival; see Hieronymus, Vita S. Hilarionis 20 (in: J. P. MIGNE [ed.], Patrologia Latinae 23:37). Clearly, this name and its linguistic derivatives were very widely distributed throughout the Roman Empire, and especially in the Land of Israel, both in Greek and Latin. Additionally, if the Land of Israel Amoraim used the Greek term to describe a certain phenomenon, when Hebrew or Aramaic terms could have served equally well to transmit a similar message, then this term bore special content, that could not be rendered in Semitic terms. See S. LIEBERMAN, Kalos, Killussin, in: Alei Ayin: The Salman Schocken Jubilee Volume, Jerusalem 1948-1952, p. 75 (= IDEM, Studies in Palestinian Talmudic Literature, p. 433) (Hebrew); E. E. URBACH, Kilos – About Lieberman from Lieberman, in: Researches in Talmudic Literature – A Study Conference in Honour of the Eightieth Birthday of Shaul Lieberman Held 13-14 June 1978, Jerusalem 1983, p. 8 (Hebrew).

played a central role. Accordingly, and following the Belgian orientalist Franz Cumont, we should take note of the Ἡλαρία festival held in classical Greece upon the coronation of a new king.¹⁴ The Rabbis apparently referred to this festival when they spoke of the “Hilaria of a king to whom came a [formal] occasion for rejoicing”. Cumont, however, relied on the writings of the Greek playwright Aristophanes (ca. 450-385 BCE), and besides this source, there is no proof of the continuing use of the Greek term hilaria in the late Roman period to characterize the festivities accompanying the rise to power of the Roman emperor. Moreover, the Rabbis were cognizant of the Roman holiday marking the emperor's ascent to the throne (dies imperii), but referred to it with a different term: “the anniversaries [yom genusia, and with many variants] of kings” or “the commemoration of empire [kratesis]”.¹⁵ The suggested parallel between the Hilaria of the Rabbinic midrashim and the commemoration of the rise to power of the Roman emperor should therefore be rejected.

2. “Hilaria” – the Egyptian context:

A more likely possibility for understanding the realistic meaning of the hilaria is to be found in the inclusion in the Roman calendar of Philocalus (354 CE) of a Hilaria festival in honour of the Egyptian goddess Isis that was observed on November 3,¹⁶ that was part of a much broader festive period called Isia. These celebrations began on October 28, when the masses observed the Inuentio Osiridis, and reached their climax on November 3 with a holiday named Hilaria.¹⁷ These holidays commemorated the Egyptian myth of Isis' tumultuous search for the limbs of her brother-husband Osiris, who had been cut up by the Egyptian god Seth-Typhon, and the pieces scattered throughout the world.¹⁸ Until November 3, the holiday participants were in profound mourning, when, on that day, unbridled joyous processions suddenly burst forth, symbolizing the moment when Isis found Osiris and brought him back to life.¹⁹ In the early fifth century CE farmers in the Faleria region in Italy still celebrated the discovery of Osiris' limbs on the Hilaria day, believing that the restoration of the god's body would ensure the success of the new harvest.²⁰ It is instructive that in the late fourth century CE the linguist Maurus Servius Honoratus, the leading Latin interpreter of the writings of Virgil (who was deemed by his contemporaries to be the most knowledgeable savant in all Italy), commented that Roman matrons would utter ceremonial cries in the city streets and crossroads on the day of the finding and rejoining of the limbs of Osiris by Isis, that is, the Hilaria festival!²¹ If in such a late period, decades after the

²⁰ Rutilius Namatianus, De Reditu Suo, (trans. and ed. J. VESSEREAU & F. PRÉCHAC, Paris 1935), p. 20.

²¹ Servius obviously referred to the Hilaria festival, even if the word itself is not mentioned explicitly. See Servius, In Vergilii Aeneidos LIBRVM QVARTVM Commentarius, 609 (ed. G. THILO & H. HAGEN, vol. 1, Leipzig pagan Roman empire had officially embraced Christianity, Isis worship continued by means of the Hilaria festival, then this teaches of the widespread nature of the phenomenon in the Late Roman period, when the empire was still pagan, although we still do not possess any express pagan testimonies to this.²² We may therefore conclude that the festival that the Rabbis knew as Hilaria was in honour of Isis, since Servius' mention of matrons who celebrated the resurrection of Osiris on the Hilaria day closely corresponds with the passage in Pesikta de-Rav Kahana: "[...] the matron kept hinting, saying: 'Now, while the king conducts himself with you during the Hilaria, get at him for satisfaction of your wishes'."

A number of considerations, however, lead us to reject the Egyptian context, as well. First, the passage in Pesikta de-Rav Kahana and the parallels link the Hilaria celebration with the rite of the emperor, while in the pagan sources mentioning the Hilaria festival in honour of the Egyptian goddess there is no proven connection with the rite of the emperor, except the tenuous fact that the emperor Gaius Caligula (37-41 CE) was the first to formally introduce the rite of Isis to Rome.²³ Furthermore, it transpires that the Rabbis used the term "Hilaria" because this festival was a quite common and widespread religious-cultic phenomenon in the third-century Land of Israel reality, and its popularity led to its inclusion in the midrashic literature. The rite of Isis, however, was almost nonexistent in Late Roman Palestine, and it is highly unlikely that the Rabbis referred to some obscure celebration in honour of a goddess whose rite, despite its popularity throughout the Roman Empire,²⁴ was negligible in the Land of Israel in their time.²⁵ Finally, 1881, p. 570): unde permansit in eius sacris, ut certis diebus percompita a matronis exerceatur ululatus, sicut in Isidis sacris, ubi est imitatio inventi Osiridis quem dilaniatum a Typhone eius fratre uxor Isis per totum orbem requisisse narrator; F. DUNAND, Isis: Mère des Dieux, Paris 2000, p. 119.

²² Put differently, if this term is connected to the rite of Isis, then the mention of the Hilaria festival in the Amoraitic literature is apparently the only testimony to this celebration in the third century CE in the east of the Roman empire, with the consequent importance of this term's appearance in the Talmudic literature.

²³ DUNAND, Isis, loc. cit.

²⁴ For general research of the spread of the Egyptian rite through the Roman empire, see, e.g., TURCAN, Les cultes orientaux, pp. 83-104; on the spread of the cult of Isis in the eastern Mediterranean basin, see F. DUNAND, Le Culte d'Isis dans le bassin oriental de la Méditerranée, vols. 1-3, Leiden 1973 (=

the Hilaria festival of Isis mentioned in the calendar of Philocalus is absent from other calendars, and especially from the Feriale Duranum list written on a papyrus that came to light during the archaeological excavations of the city of Dura-Europos (on the east bank of the Euphrates river) in the 1930s. This listing that is dated to 225-227 CE contains a list of the official holidays of the Roman Cohors XX Palmyrenorum that was encamped in Dura-Europos during those years. The importance of this list lies in its being the sole example of a complete Roman calendar from the Late Roman period that originated in the east of the empire.²⁶ Only Roman holidays and Roman deities are mentioned in this calendar that excluded Eastern rites, even Hellenized Egyptian ones.²⁷ I showed elsewhere that the public celebrations listed in mAZ 1:2 (following MS. Kaufmann) closely correspond to the Roman festivals in the Roman military calendar from Dura-Europos;²⁸ and it is not inconceivable that the Rabbis were aware of this calendar. Since it lacked the Hilaria festival in honour of Isis, it is quite plausible that the Land of Israel Rabbis had no knowledge of this Egyptian holiday.

²⁵ E. FRIEDHEIM, Pagan Cults in Roman Palestine (Master's thesis, Bar-Ilan University, 1995), pp. 10-18, 87 (Hebrew). Although isolated finds possibly attesting to the rite of Isis have been discovered in the Land of Israel (FRIEDHEIM, loc. cit.), they should not be linked to a hypothetical festival named "Hilaria" in honour of this goddess. See IDEM, The Pagan Cults of Samaria-Sebaste in the Hellenistic and Roman Periods and the Ethnical Composition of the Local Population, in: Y. ESHEL (ed.), Judea & Samaria Research Studies: Proceedings of the 6th Annual Meeting – 1996, Kedumim / Ariel 1997, pp. 158-61 (Hebrew); IDEM, Rabbinisme et paganisme, pp. 200-208. Isis is not mentioned explicitly in the Rabbinic literature (see IDEM, Rabbinisme et paganisme, p. 201; IDEM, Who Are the Deities Concealed Behind the Rabbinic Expression 'A Nursing Female Image'?, in: Harvard Theological Review 96 [2003], pp. 239-50, esp. p. 240), although many scholars have thought otherwise from the late nineteenth century to the present. See, e.g., IDEM, Rabbinisme et paganisme, pp. 199 n. 712, 202 n. 721, 204 nn. 727-36. See also recently: BOHAK, Rabbinic Perspectives, p. 228; C. ULMER, Methodological Considerations in respect to Egyptian Cultural Icons in Rabbinic Literature: Cleopatra, Isis and Serapis, in: Henoch 29 (2007), pp. 327-353. To the best of our knowledge, however, no Roman-period temple of Isis has been unearthed in Roman Palestine. See DUNAND, Le Culte d'Isis, vol. 3, p. 132; R. A. WILD, The Known Isis-Serapis Sanctuaries from the Roman Period, in: W. HAASE & H. TEMPORINI (eds.), ANRW II,17,4, Berlin / New York 1984, p. 1754.

3. “Hilaria” – the Anatolian / Phrygian context:

The few scholars who discussed the appearance of the name Hilaria in the exegetical literature mostly ignored the fact that this holiday was the central ceremony in the rite of the Phrygian goddess Kybele, that was observed on March 25.²⁹ Between March 15 and 24 the adherents of Kybele would commemorate, and some would even reenact, the mythological castration and death of Attis, the lover of the Phrygian goddess. The profound mourning would peak on March 24, which was known as

²⁹ Except for KRAUSS, Griechische und Lateinische Lehnwörter, vol. 1, p. 58, but this outstanding scholar undoubtedly noted the name of the holiday in the calendar of Philocalus, but was not aware of the cultic-ceremonial context that connected the content of the exegesis with the rite of the Anatolian goddess Kybele (see below). On this festival in the rite of Kybele, see the extensive discussions: F. CUMONT, Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Paris ⁴1947), pp. 54, 56, 225 n. 41; J. BAYET, Histoire politique et psychologique de la religion romaine, Paris ²1973, p. 216; W. BURKERT, Les cultes à mystères dans l'antiquité, Paris 1991, pp. 34, 68-69; TURCAN, Les cultes orientaux, p. 52. The Latin term hilaria is also indicative of the festival to Isis, but, from the philological aspect, most linguists ascribe this holiday to the cult of Kybele. See, e.g., F. GAFFIOT, Dictionnaire Latin-Français, Paris ³2000, p. 752, s. v. Hilaria. This might teach of the holiday's importance for scholars, as well. On the central celebrations in honour of Kybele, see P. LAMBRECHTS, Les fêtes ‘phrygiennes’ de Cybèle et d'Attis, in: Bulletin de l'Institut Historique Belge de Rome 27 (1952), pp. 141-70; M. “Dies Sanguinis” (the “day of blood”). During the procession that was accompanied by loud, mind-dulling music, the high priest of Kybele, the Archigallos, in a momentary trance, would castrate himself before the crowd, in a re-enactment of what had befallen Attis.³⁰ The following day (March 25) the faithful would celebrate the resurrection of Attis with a most festive day called Ἰλάρια, that was marked by an outbreak of exceptional rejoicing and debauchery among the believers, as is clearly indicated in the portrayal by the emperor Julian (360-363 CE) of the drastic and sudden transition - from chilling sorrow and brutal self-mutilation to unbridled revelry - that characterized the March rite of Kybele.³¹ Beginning in the time of the emperor Commodus (180-192

³¹ Iulianus, Oration V. in Matr. Deorum, 169d (for an English trans.: W. C. WRIGHT, LCL, pp. 472-73): οὐπερ γενομένου πάντος ἔπεσθαι χρὴ τὰ Ἰλάρια. Τί γὰρ εὐθυμότερον, τί δὲ ἱλαρώτερον γένοιτο ἂν ψυχῆς ἀπειρίαν μὲν καὶ γένεσιν καὶ τὸν ἐν αὐτῇ κλύδωνα διαφυγούσης, ἐπὶ δὲ τοὺς θεοὺς αὐτοὺς ἀναχθείσης. It seems that celebrating during these days was obligatory during the Late Roman period, as is implied by the following source: Scriptores Historiae Augustae [= SHA], Aurelianus 1:1: “Hilaribus, quibus omnia festa et fieri debere scimus et dici” (for a French trans.: A. CHASTAGNOL, Paris 1994, p. 968). For an analysis of the orgiastic ardour of the believers in Kybele on this day, see the excellent studies: P. PACHIS, Γαλλαῖον κυβέλης ὀλόλυγμα (ANTHOL. PALAT. VI, 173): L'élément orgiastique dans le culte de Cybèle, in: E. N. LANE (ed.), Cybele, Attis and Related Cults: Essays in Memory of M. J. Vermaseren, Leiden / New York / Cologne 1996, pp. 212-13, 219; R. TURCAN, Attis Platonius, in: Cybele, Attis and Related Cults, p. 402; P. BORGEAUD, La Mère des dieux: de Cybèle à la vierge Marie, Paris 1996, p. 133. Immediately evident is the parallelism between the myths: between the mourning over the death of Attis among the believers in Kybele and the ensuing rejoicing, and the grief by the devotees of Isis at the death of Osiris and the joy that follows the latter's resurrection, with the celebration, in both instances, named “Hilaria”. On the ceremonial level, incidentally, at times the same priest served Isis and Kybele. See L. VIDMAN, Isis und Serapis bei den Griechen und Römern, Berlin 1970, pp. 139-55; MALAISE, Les conditions de pénétration, pp. 461-68. Thus, in the syncretistic spirit of the age of polytheism, the phenomenon of death and resurrection, or of human birth and rebirth after a person's death (Natus et Renatus), were characteristic of many

CE), the Hilaria festival became an impressive event that not only represented the resurrection and return of Attis, it also marked the revival of the seasons of the year and agricultural life in the beginning of the spring season.³² This main component of this celebration was the mass procession, with the participation of the emperor himself and representatives of the upper classes of Roman society (honestiores), such as senators and equestrians. Significantly, during the course of the procession the emperor and the members of the nobility distributed all manner of precious figurines all made of gold and silver, which would be presented to the masses at the feet of the statues of Kybele and Attis.³³ It is related that the emperor Alexander Severus (222-235 CE), who would always devotedly feed his servants vegetables, meats, and legumes, as the latter's forefathers had done (by providing for their children), would give them precious fowl such as pheasants - at times even two - in addition to two chickens, on certain holidays, such as the Roman new year that fell in January (Kalendae Ianuariae), the magnificent games to Appolo (Ludi Appolinares) that were held on July 6-13, the banquet to Jupiter Capitolinus that was conducted on September, and, most relevant to our discussion, on the Hilaria celebrations in honour of the "mother of the gods" on March 25.³⁴ This instructive source finely cults with mystery rites that promised their believers happiness in this world and eternal life in the hereafter. The Rabbis, however, were seemingly exposed to only a single rite, and not to the syncretistic system characteristic of the pagan world.

³² Although in the past, some scholars thought that nothing was known regarding the holiday's rites (see P. DECHARME, Cybele, in: C. DAREMBERG & E. SAGLIO [eds.], Dictionnaire des antiquités grecques et romaines, 1 / 2, Paris 1880 [= repr. Graz 1969], p. 1682b: "nous en ignorons les détails"), we currently possess more, and detailed, information concerning this festival. On the ceremony, see TURCAN, Attis Platonius, pp. 50, 53. It is noteworthy that in 187 CE a person named Martinus attempted to assassinate the emperor Commodus during the Hilaria festivities; he was caught in time and immediately executed. The celebrations that year were more magnificent than in previous years, after the crowds declared that the goddess Kybele had saved the emperor. This impressive event was commemorated on imperial coins from the time of Commodus. See Herodianus, Historia Romana 1:10:5-7; R. TURCAN, Numismatique romaine du culte métroaque, Leiden 1983 (= EPRO, vol. 97), pp. 37 ff., and the references to primary sources.

clarifies the statement attributed to the matron in the exegesis by Rav, the contemporary of this emperor,³⁵ concerning the king: "while the king conducts himself with you during the Hilaria, get at him for satisfaction of your wishes."³⁶ In the Roman sources, we know of the Hilaria mainly from the city of Rome; to the best of our knowledge, no literary or epigraphic extra-Rabbinic source confirms the existence of the Hilaria festival in the Land of Israel and the Syrian-Phoenician east in the first centuries CE.³⁷ A number of archaeological finds, however, attest to the existence of the Anatolian rite of Kybele in Roman Palestine and its surroundings. Thus, for example, in Ptolemais-Akko, Kybele appears on city coins from the third century CE.³⁸ A statue of Ky-CHASTAGNOL, Paris 1994, pp. 602-3).

³⁵ It should be recalled at this juncture that R. Judah ha-Nasi was almost certainly still alive in 222 CE, when Alexander Severus waived the coronation tax (aurum coronarium) upon his ascending the throne, since R. Judah mentions the abolition of this tax. See bBB 8a: "the demand for the coronation tax was repealed". On this statement, see S. SAFRAI, On the Chronological Problem of the Patriarchs in the Second and Third Centuries CE, in: Proceedings of the Sixth World Congress of Jewish Studies, Division B, History of the Jewish People, Jerusalem 1976, pp. 56-57 (= S. SAFRAI, In Times of the Temple and Mishnah – Studies in Jewish History, Jerusalem 1994, vol. 2, p. 626) (Hebrew): "Rabbi [= R. Judah ha-Nasi] lived at least until the summer of 222"; D. III / 2, Jerusalem 2005, p. 901 n. 65 (Hebrew). R. Judah ha-Nasi's pupil Abba ben Aivu (Rav), went to Babylonia at approximately that time, and he might therefore have had knowledge of Alexander Severus' actions during the Hilaria celebrations in honour of Kybele and have included them in his exposition. This question requires further study.

bele from the Late Roman period was discovered in Caesarea Maritima.³⁹ We similarly know of Anatolian rites in third-century CE Caesarea, as can be learned from, for example, a fragmentary dedicatory inscription to Jupiter Dolichenus;⁴⁰ the discovery of a statue of the goddess Artemis in the city of Ephesia in Asia Minor;⁴¹ and gems bearing the image of the Anatolian moon-god Men.⁴² In Ascalon, as well, archaeological excavations unearthed a third-century CE figurine of Kybele.⁴³ This goddess might possibly appear on coins of Neapolis / Shechem from the Roman period, and she could very well have been worshipped in the city in the late Hellenistic period.⁴⁴ Some scholars argued for the existence of the rite of Kybele in Aelia Capitolina in the third century CE,⁴⁵ but the arguments they advanced are not convincing.⁴⁶ Many Anatolian rites that were closely linked to the rite of Kybele were observed in different places in Roman Palestine, such as the city of Geva (in the area of Mishmar ha-Emek), where a temple of the god Men apparently was active from the time of the emperor Domitian (81-96 CE), as is indicated by the numismatic and epigraphic finds from the site.⁴⁷ The scholarly research has also shown some Tannaim, such as R. 'Akiva, had detailed knowledge of the Syrian, and especially Anatolian, rites.⁴⁸

In conclusion, the geographical distribution of the rite of Kybele in Roman Palestine and its surroundings allows us to surmise the existence of the Hilaria festival, as well, in this region, and that the Jews of the Land of Israel probably had some experience with it, to the extent that the Land of Israel Amoraim did not need to use a word of Semitic origin to describe a contemporary situation identical to the Hilaria.⁴⁹

ISAAC, Two Greek Inscriptions from Tell Abu-Shusha, in: Geva: Archaeological Discoveries, p. 225. Although the inscription is only a single word ἀρχιερεύ[ς] (= high priest), the intent is to a pagan priest (ISAAC, loc. cit.: “this is undoubtedly a local pagan rite”); and since the rite of Men was the chief cult in the city, the priest most probably worshiped this deity; FRIEDHEIM, Pagan Cults in Roman Palestine, p. 180. The connection between the rite of Men and that of Kybele is that both were Phrygian, and that Men was a moon-god - and the full moon played an important role in the rite of Kybele; see TURCAN, Les cultes orientaux, p. 74. This point is of great importance, because the Land of Israel Rabbis were aware that Gentiles – and apparently Jews, as well – worshiped the moon; see, e.g., mAZ 3:3; tAZ 5:1 (ed. ZUCKERMANDEL, p. 468); yAZ 3:3, 42d; bAZ 42b; tHul 2:18 (ed. ZUCKERMANDEL, p. 503): “If one slaughters in the name of the sun, in the name of the moon [...] this is the flesh of sacrifices to the dead”; bHul 40a; bAZ 42b. Consequently, among the numerous lunar gods in the Land of Israel, they might also have been aware of the Anatolian Men, and similarly of the Phrygian Kybele, who was known as the “great mother” (Magna Mater).

⁴⁸ FRIEDHEIM, Rabbinisme et paganisme, pp. 138-52.

We see that the term hilaria was commonly known during the time of the Talmud, and it seems that the Land of Israel Amoraim could find no more patent antithesis to the day on which the Torah was given, when the Israelites stood “in awe, trembling, and sweat” when faced with the greatness of the hour, than the pagan Hilaria celebrations in honour of Kybele, whose unbridled debauchery breached the moral bounds set by the Rabbis. Moreover, the Rabbis apparently could find no better analogy for the situation in which the Jews were mandated to address their requests to God, who would grant their wishes, than that of the Gentiles on the Hilaria day in honour of the Anatolian / Phrygian Kybele, who were treated so generously by the Roman emperor.⁵⁰ thorough and detailed knowledge of many pagan practices is evident in his numerous dicta regarding idolatry, since his various rulings attest to a profound awareness of this subject. See, e.g., yShevi 8:8, 38b-c (and see in this context: G. J. BLIDSTEIN, R. Yohanan, Idolatry and Public Privileges, in: Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic and Roman Periods 5 [1974], pp. 154-61); yAZ 3:3, 42d (and see: FRIEDHEIM, Rabbinisme et paganisme, pp. 177-88); bYev 46a; bSanh 49a; 60b-61a; 62a; bAZ 8a; 13a; 14a; 16b; 19b; 22a; 30b, and many more. He might also have been conscious of Anatolian rites, as is indicated by a tradition in bYoma 22b: “For R. Johanan said in the name of R. Simeon ben Jehozadak: One should not appoint a person as a leader of the community unless he carries a basket of reptiles on his back, so that if he becomes arrogant, he may be told: Turn around.” Y. Meshorer explained that the “basket of reptiles” mentioned in the tradition is almost certainly the Κίστη μυστικά, with this meaning, that appears on many Land of Israel coins, such as in Sebaste-Samaria. See Y. MESHORER, The ‘Cista Mystica’ and Worship of Kore-Persephone at Samaria, in: Eretz-Israel 15 (1981), pp. 356-57 (Hebrew). The cista mystica is indicative of the existence of the mystery rites of many gods, including the Anatolian gods Kybele and Attis; see CUMONT, Les religions orientales, p. 225 and n. 41; BURKERT, Les cultes à mystères, p. 18 and n. 31; E. M. W. TILLYARD, A Cybele Altar in London, in: Journal of Roman Studies 7 (1917), pp. 284-288, esp. pp. 284, 285 and pl. VIII. MESHORER, Cista Mystica, p. 357, suggested the following understanding of R. Johanan's dictum: he recommends appointing as communal leader someone who in the past underwent the secret experience of the mysteries, and has now mended his ways, so that if he does not properly carry out his responsibilities to the public, he is to be told: “Turn around”. It therefore is not inconceivable that R. Johanan was cognizant of the rite of Kybele and Attis; and if so, then this sage, as well, was aware of the central festival in honour of Kybele, namely, the Hilaria.

⁵⁰ It would be interesting to compare this with the use made by the Rabbis in their expositions of the Maiumas celebrations. These festivities, with their emphasis on licentiousness and harlotry, were dedicated to the Hellenized

Phoenician-Syrian rite of Aphrodite-Astarte-Atargatis and Dionysus, the Greek god of wine. This celebration was observed in many locations in Palestine and the surrounding area in the Late Roman and Byzantine periods; see the recent study: E. DVORJETSKI, The Maiumas Festivals at Ashkelon during the Byzantine Period – ‘What was perpetrated by the coastal cities was not perpetrated by the generation of the Flood’, in: A. SASSON / Z. SAFRAI & N. SAGIV (eds.), Ashkelon: A City on the Seashore, Tel Aviv 2001, pp. 100-104 (Hebrew); FRIEDHEIM, Rabbinisme et paganisme, pp. 87-98. Thus, e.g., the Rabbis compared the despicable behaviour of the people of Israel in the time of Amos to the Maiumas; see MekhY, be-šalah 1 (ed. HOROWITZ-RABIN, p. 84 and n. 9); and esp. WayR 5:3 (ed. MARGULIES, p. 108 and n. 6): “What is ‘festive meals’ (Amos 6:7)? R. Aivu said: They had thirteen maiumas [celebrations], one for each tribe and one for them all. All were destroyed, and nothing remained of them save this - to make known what abominations came from them”; TanB, šemini 8 (ed. BUBER, pp. 26-27). At the beginning of the twentieth century, Büchler showed this midrashic passage closely corresponds to the “place of revelry (βητομαρσεα ή κ[αί] Μαιουμας)” mentioned in the Madaba map (see A. BÜCHLER, Une localité énigmatique mentionnée sur la mosaïque de Madaba, in: Revue des Études Juives 42 [1901], pp. 125-28), where orgies were conducted in honour of Baal-Peor until the Roman period; see also C. CLERMONT-GANNEAU, Betomarsea-Maioumas et les fêtes orgiaques de Baal-Peor, in: Recueil d’Archéologie Orientale, vol. 4, Paris 1901, pp. 339-45. Further to this exegesis, we should mention that, in all their expositions, the Rabbis severely condemned the Maiumas rites (for a summation of the sources, see DVORJETSKI, The Maiumas Festivals, pp. 103 ff.), with the exception of a single midrash that surprisingly compares the Revelation with the Maiumas celebration. See MTehil 18:17 (ed. BUBER, pp. 146-47; trans. based on W. G. BRAUDE, New Haven 1959, pp. 246-47): “R. Judah ha-Nasi [in different textual witnesses: R. Yuden Nesi’in; see BUBER, ad loc., n. 110; this exegesis might have originated in the third century CE] said: A flesh-and-blood king when going out to war takes all his troops with him, but when going to his Maiumas [wrongly translated by Braude: May Festival] takes only his body-guard to wait upon him. But the Holy One, blessed be He, when He goes out to war, goes alone, as it is said (Exod. 15:3): ‘The Lord, the Warrior, Lord is His name’; but when He goes to His Maiumas, the giving of the Torah, see what Scripture says: ‘God’s chariots are myriads upon myriads, thousands upon thousands [the Lord is among them as in Sinai in holiness]’ (Ps. 68:18); and also: ‘And the Lord my God [with all the holy beings] will come to you’ (Zech. 14:5).” Although in the various parallels the word maiumas, in relation to the Giving of the Torah, was exchanged by other terms, maiumas appears to be the correct version (see BUBER, op cit., n. 111: “And in Sifrei [...], ‘When he comes forth unscathed [le-šalom]’, the version is undoubtedly maiumas, and one of the copyists inadvertently wrote le-šalom.” The word maiumas here denotes the king’s excessive rejoicing; and in Ostia, near Rome, both the Roman senators and the emperor would dive into the sea in honour of Aphrodite and Dionysus in the festive Maiumas rite. See J. CARCOPINO, Virgile et les origines d'Ostie, Paris ²1968, pp. 129-33. In MTehil the exegete sought to draw an analogy between the supreme joy of the Holy One, blessed be He, at the Giving of the Torah and the renowned delight of the Roman emperor during the Maiumas festival. In, however, the expositions that mention the Hilaria, the Land of Israel Amoraim sought to depict the fear with which the Israelites stood at Mount Sinai, the total antithesis to the licentiousness and frivolity that characterized the Gentile participants at the Hilaria festival in honour of Kybele. As is well-known, the Rabbis frequently use imagery drawn from the surrounding Graeco-Roman culture to vitalize the Biblical narratives for their audience, who were quite familiar with the contemporary culture. The aggadic literature therefore contains parables relating to athletes - an image that originated in the Roman games, and the like (see S. LIEBERMAN, Greek in Jewish Palestine – Studies in the Life and Manners of Jewish Palestine in the II-IV Centuries C. E., New York ²1950, pp. 156ff; D. STERN, Parables in Midrash: Narrative and Exegesis in Rabbinic Literature, Cambridge MA 1991, pp. 27ff; TZ. GROSSMARK, Images of God in Rabbinical Literature Borrowed from the Sphere of the Roman Spectacles, in: Proceedings of the Twelfth World Congress of Jewish Studies, Division B, History of the Jewish People, Jerusalem 2000, pp. 75-84 [Hebrew]. The fact that the Land of Israel Amoraim were even willing to use patently pagan motifs that were known to the Jews of the land, such as the lascivious rites performed by the neighbouring Gentiles, to portray different behavioural patterns (as circumstances dictated), both of the Israelites and, at times, of the God of Israel, is eloquent.
