

Zeitschrift: Mitteilungsblatt / Keramik-Freunde der Schweiz = Revue des Amis Suisses de la Céramique = Rivista degli Amici Svizzeri della Ceramica

Herausgeber: Keramik-Freunde der Schweiz

Band: - (1997)

Heft: 111

Artikel: The comedians of Franz Antonÿ Bustellÿ

Autor: Newman, Michael

Kapitel: The sixteen comedians

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-395191>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist die Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften auf E-Periodica. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Zeitschriften und ist nicht verantwortlich für deren Inhalte. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern beziehungsweise den externen Rechteinhabern. Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen sowie auf Social Media-Kanälen oder Webseiten ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Mehr erfahren

Conditions d'utilisation

L'ETH Library est le fournisseur des revues numérisées. Elle ne détient aucun droit d'auteur sur les revues et n'est pas responsable de leur contenu. En règle générale, les droits sont détenus par les éditeurs ou les détenteurs de droits externes. La reproduction d'images dans des publications imprimées ou en ligne ainsi que sur des canaux de médias sociaux ou des sites web n'est autorisée qu'avec l'accord préalable des détenteurs des droits. En savoir plus

Terms of use

The ETH Library is the provider of the digitised journals. It does not own any copyrights to the journals and is not responsible for their content. The rights usually lie with the publishers or the external rights holders. Publishing images in print and online publications, as well as on social media channels or websites, is only permitted with the prior consent of the rights holders. Find out more

Download PDF: 11.01.2026

ETH-Bibliothek Zürich, E-Periodica, <https://www.e-periodica.ch>

The sixteen comedians

15. LA DONNA IULIA. German engraving signed C.P. Maj.-I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin. – Martin Engelbrecht exc. A.V., Augsburg. Mid-18th century. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo. Rome.

The sixteen Italian Comedy figures – without question Bustelli's finest achievements – were probably modelled in rapid succession between 1759 and 1760. They first appeared in the Inventory of Moulds<sup>5</sup> in that year. Slightly smaller, and more ethereally conceived in the true Bavarian rococo vein than the two earlier comedians, they stand on lighter, pancake-like flat bases with cut-out rococo scrolling, and with spiral rocailles sweeping up from the base at the rear to support the body. As we mentioned earlier, Bustelli has arranged his troupe in eight pairs, each pair with a male confronting a female comedian.

Julia and Pantalone

The artist establishes instantly that Julia and Pantalone are a mismatched pair. Isabella's pretty waiting woman smilingly draws back from the lurking wanton and, looking him straight into the eyes, mockingly rejects his lewd advances, expressed by his lustful glances and a pretentious yet condescending obeisance.

The role of Donna Julia is not always strictly defined and varies in different surviving comedy sketches. There are practically no known engraved images of her. Most often, she plays Isabella's maid-servant, but Bustelli has made of her more of the lady's companion (fig. 16).

16. JULIA. Height 20.3 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold on the right-hand plane of the base, impressed 1. Bayerisches Nationalmuseum, Munich.

17. PANTALONE. Height 18 cm. Impressed shield mark on scroll support behind the left leg; incised D and three puce dots under the base. By courtesy of Christie's, London.

18. PANTALON. French mirror-image engraving by Joullain père after Jacques Callot for Ricoboni's Histoire du Théâtre Italien, second version. First third-18th century. Private Theatre Collection.

The wasp-waisted girl has turned to her left to glare at the old fellow stalking her, her right hand raised and making the time-honoured sign of dimitto, I dismiss<sup>40</sup>. Her left is holding the edge of her close-fitting, gilt-buttoned jacket, flaring out from her thin waist. She is about to accompany her mistress to the hunt and has tied her long fair hair with a black ribbon at the back; another one around her neck is looped into a large bow at the throat. The elegant, green velvet hunting habit, with large pockets on the jacket, is trimmed throughout with gold piping and bordered with gold braid at the hem of the wide skirt, the flowing folds of which are so beautifully modelled by Bustelli that Julia's left leg, from thigh to ankle, is clearly discernable through the soft cloth. She is still wearing her pale green leather slippers. The rococo base is heightened with gold, the shield mark is impressed onto the flat part near her right foot.

The representation of Donna Iulia at the lower left of figure 5 bears no similarity to Bustelli's porcelain masterpiece. It is a mirror-image taken from a slightly earlier engraving by I. Wachsmuth (fig. 15). If Bustelli knew this engraving, it certainly did not inspire him for, apart from a certain likeness in the costume, his gracefully animated figure is far from this stiffly set illustration.

19. PANTALON. German engraving published by Johann Jacob Wolrab (1675–1746). Nuremberg c. 1720. The Institute for Theatre, Cinema and Television Research, University of Cologne (Niessen Collection).

Pantalone is a quintessential character of the Commedia dell'Arte. This lecherous, miserly satyr has his ancestry in the Greek and Roman theatres and, under various names, amongst them Gerontio, was also known in the Italian commedia sostenuta. In the course of the development in mid-sixteenth century Italy of the Commedia dell'Arte, Pantalone's role was moulded into that of a wealthy, more or less niggardly merchant, who carried his gold on his person at all times, but who was also the over-protective father of the beautiful Isabella whom he wished to marry off well – particularly if he could gain his own advantages from such a marriage. During the following two hundred years, Pantalone's flawed character became ever more apparent. At most

SIGNOR PANTALON VENETIANO.
Nobilis in scena deridiculus.
Juven. Sat. VIII. 30.
--- quis enim generosum dixerit hunc qui
Indignus genere, et præclaro nomine tantum
Insignis ---

20. SIGNOR PANTALON VENETIANO. Anonymous French engraving from a series of fourteen, each with a Latin quotation, c. 1720. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome.

times, he played a chicken-chested, dissolute Merchant of Venice, cunning, distrustful, a worn-out old skinflint who would moralize in his cups or pretend to be a great seducer. He lurked in dark corners like a bird of prey, coughing, spitting and wiping his nose. Everyone, especially the young women of the cast, took him for a fool, poked fun at him and jeered, whilst Harlequin and his boon companions tricked and duped him right and left. Just occasionally, a comedy plot would give Pantalone the role of a timorous, faint-hearted and distrustful old man.

Circling Julia like a love-lorn billy-goat, left foot forward, the body leaning outward from the waist, his head turned to the right and his hands clasped behind his back under the cloak, Pantalone wears the clothes which have always been customary to his role (fig. 17). A black beak-shaped woollen cap on his wispy grey hair complements the pale face with a hooked nose, above a straggly, pointed beard. The iron-red cloth doublet with reddish-brown buttons, and iron-red knee-breeches, are edged with gold trimming. A dagger hangs from a leather belt at his left side. His flowing black cloak with a gold-embroidered pink collar has a lining with a gold zigzag pattern. Paler red hose, embroidered above the ankles, and pointed yellow leather slippers complete the costume. The flat, gilt-enhanced base bears the impressed shield mark on the rising support scroll behind the figure's left leg.

The elderly Pantalone in Weigel's composite engraving of 1723 as shown in figure 4, there courting a flirtatious Columbine, has perhaps a few basic similarities with Bustelli's porcelain model, but the real source of all subsequent engravings depicting Pantalone, and hence of the majority of engraved models available to eighteenth century porcelain artists, goes back to the outstanding seventeenth century artist-engraver, Jacques Callot (1592/3–1635) who, during a sojourn in Florence in 1618, engraved Les Trois Pantalons, a set of three large figures of the Commedia dell'Arte representing Pantalone<sup>41</sup>, the Captain and Scapino. It is the first et delin.

LE SIEUR PANTALON.

Martin Engelbrecht exc. A.V.

21. LE SIEUR PANTALON. German engraving signed C.P. Maj.-I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin. – Martin Engelbrecht exc. A.V., Augsburg, mid-18th century. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Roma.

who interests us here, for he is the prototype of almost all later engravings. Even Ricoboni used Callot's Pantalone for an illustration in his Histoire du Théâtre Italien<sup>42</sup>, for which Joullain père engraved a mirror-image, duly acknowledging his source – Calot inv./ Joullain sculp. A later version is illustrated here (fig. 18). Noticeably different from the Nymphenburg porcelain figure, it shows Pantalone wearing full length hose from waist to ankles, and a round, not a peaked cap. Furthermore, his right hand is on his heart.

Bustelli would also have had knowledge of two other images of Pantalone, published a century after Callot's. In the first (fig. 19), Pantalone walks in a baroque garden landscape and wears the knee-breeches – pantaloons – from which the role name was derived. His left arm is tucked into the cloak, but the right hand flips up the long, ostentatiously false beard which he has hooked over his ears. This engraving is one of a set of fourteen by an unknown engraver. The set was published by Johann Jacob Wolrab of Nuremberg around 1720, the etcher having copied, in most cases, the work of French engravers at the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries. The art-historical importance of these fourteen prints in the development of Italian Comedy iconography and their significance as source material for eighteenth century porcelain modellers at the Höchst, Fürstenberg and Würzburg factories has been discussed in detail by Hansen and Clarke, both of whom illustrated this engravings<sup>43</sup>.

The other engraving of 1720 (fig. 20) also comes from a series of fourteen, which includes figure 12. Here we find both of Pantalone's hands well hidden under the voluminous cloak. The shading suggests the red doublet, red pantaloons, and a black cloak. A wiry, pointed tuft of hair jutting out from under his cap presages the later obligatory peaked cap.

Yet another possible source for Bustelli is a mid-century engraving of Pantalone in a wooded landscape with a waterfall (fig. 21) in which almost all the features of the porcelain figure are assembled. What is missing – and must always be missing from an engraved model – are the porcelain figure's shifty mien, the subservient obeisance, the crafty turns of head and body, the incomparable Bustelli touch. This last engraving, as also figure 15 is part of a rare set of possibly twelve sheets, each with two figures<sup>44</sup>.

Isabella and Octavio

Bejewelled Isabella, loved daughter of Pantalone, who strictly forbids her to have any concourse with precious Octavio, nevertheless meets her lover behind her father's back. Whilst he ardently, if a trifle mincingly, blows her a kiss, she draws away from him coyly but, at the same time, invites his advances with a gesture and a pleading look in her eyes. She has attracted his attention to her very kissable lips by applying a beauty spot right next to them. Of all ceramic artists in the eighteenth century, only Bustelli had the genius to create such delicate and telling expressions on the faces of even unpainted porcelain figures.

At first playing the Amoureuse in Flaminio Scala's Florentine troupe of Gelosi, a sixteen-year old girl from Padua by the name of Isabella was married in 1578 to the actor who played the Captain, Francesco Andreini. Isabella Andreini soon became the most celebrated actress of her time in Italy. The company spent some months in France in 1584, where she renewed her successes. Recalled to France by Henry IV in 1600, she remained until 1604<sup>45</sup>. The name «Isabella» became generic to the role of the principal innamorata in the Théâtre Italien, a role which is central to many of the Comedy's actions. Protected by Pantalone, who would like to steer her into a marriage with the Captain, she abandons herself to a love play with beautiful Octavio. She has a calm beauty which often confuses her lovers and she mystifies them with her insistence to stand on ceremony and restraint; but she also shows that there is a brain behind that lovely face. Isabella frequently makes fun of the elderly characters who pursue her and, with her friends, she whispers behind her hands about their failings. In the end, she will yield to the billing and cooing of her lover.

Bustelli's figure of Isabella is a pretty young girl, well-groomed, with an air of having been indulged by a doting father at all times. The first signs of a slight double chin are visible, but a wide forehead confirms a self-willed character (fig. 22).

She leans back from her paramour, her head turned to the left in order to look at him. Both hands seem to be raised in a defensive movement; but perhaps they are not altogether pushing Octavio away. Astonishingly, Bustelli must have been quite familiar with the old Neapolitan finger language: Isabella's left hand signal is indeed adagio, softly<sup>46</sup>; but her right-hand sign can only be interpreted as chiedere bacio, how about a kiss?<sup>47</sup>

Her blond hair is swept back over the right ear and falls in long ringlets to her left shoulder. A necklace of pale blue pearls holds a purple silk bow at the front. Her white muslin shirt appears above the décolleté bodice and has very wide protruding cuffs at the wrists. The skirt of the purple moiré silk-taffeta dress, with a richly gilt embroidered bodice, falls

22. ISABELLA. Height 19.5 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold in front of the right slipper, impressed O. By courtesy of Christie's, London (now in Bayerisches Nationalmuseum, Munich).

23. OCTAVIO. Height 19.1 cm. Impressed shield mark and O.
By courtesy of the Board of Trustees of the Victoria and Albert Museum, London.

24. LA DONNA ISABELLA. Anonymous coloured engraving, cut out and pasted on board. Height 16.2 cm. Perhaps Vittoria degli Amorevoli or Isabella Andreini. c. 1580–1600. From the Recueil Fossard.

in long folds from the hips. The hem is fringed with a gilt-dentil ribbon. She wears purple slippers, the tips of which peep out from under the skirt. The flat scroll and wave base is painted with traces of green and edged with gold. The impressed blue and white shield mark, outlined in gold, has been placed in front of her right foot.

Isabella is rarely found in early engraved material. Whether the central actress in figure 4 is Isabella, Fiorinetta, Aurelia or Flaminia is open to discussion. They all played similar roles, although that of Isabella was probably the most prominent. Maurice Sand illustrates an Isabella of the year 1600, wearing a very similar costume to that of the Nymphenburg figure<sup>48</sup>, but this picture was published a century after Bustelli's creation, and we do not know where Sand had found his model. An engraving of Isabella, one of the fourteen published by Johann Jacob Wolrab in c. 1720<sup>49</sup> bears no similarities to the porcelain figure. The nearest image Bustelli could have had to hand is the sixteenth century cut-out

Pater pinxit.
Guillot venoit gaiement d'épouser sa Lizette,
Morsu des plus frondeuses riantante brunette;
Sur son front paroissoit l'innocente pudeur,
Le fard n'alloit point sa beauté naturelle,
Et de qu'on la voyoit dans le fond de son Cœur
On sentoit de l'Amour la plus vive étincelle.

LE BAISER DONNÉ

a Paris chez Fillœul à l'entrée de la rue du Faubourg au bâtiment opposé par la rue Gailarde.

A.P.D.R.

Fillœul Sculp.
Un seigneur l'aperçoit, et dit en plaisantant,
Ami, que je la baise à la Charge d'autant.
Quida, répond Guillot, je Consens à la Chose.
Lors le Monsieur appuie et renverse la doce.
Sur le front de Lizette, on vit au même instant
De cet ardent baiser naître plus d'une rose.

25a. LE BAISER DONNÉ. Engraving by Pierre Fillœul, 1736, after a missing painting by Jean-Baptiste Pater. Kupferstichkabinett, Dresden (Sächsische Landesbibliothek, Abt. Deutsche Fototek – Photo A. Rous).

from a coloured engraving of Donna Isabella, one of ten, in the remarkable Recueil Fossard (fig. 24)<sup>50</sup>. Here we have a comparable shrinking away of the body, with the hands raised against an impetuous Octavio. Even the flow of the folds in the skirt is faintly familiar. Two hundred years after the unknown engraver immortalized Isabella in the stiff pose prevalent in most prints of that period, Franz Anton Bustelli transformed a two-dimensional image into a fashionable, animated rococo statuette which one can imagine to be on a stage.

The first actor to play Octavio in Paris – on 2 November 1688, having arrived that day from Verona – was Jean-Baptiste Constantini, younger brother of Angelo Constantini, the Mezzetin of the Théâtre Italien at the Hôtel de Bourgogne<sup>51</sup>. The role was that of the principal lover, and it was played under different names, depending on the actor who played it. The most famous of these names in the early eighteenth century was Lélío, created by Louis Ricoboni, the author of the Histoire du Théâtre Italien. During the eighteenth century, Octavio – so spelled in the Nymphenburg factory's Price List of 1767 (fig. 23) – was usually cast as the fervent candidate for Isabella's favours and the persistent rival of the blustering Capitano Spavento. Octavio was a very stylish young man, moderately effeminate in his demeanour, and of somewhat mischievous, if limited intelligence. If he was pining for his lady's love, the emphatic gestures he used to press his suit never quite permitted the pain to show on his brow. He assiduously avoided the company of Pantalone by whom he was despised profoundly.

*Par bonheur pour Guillot, notre galant Seigneur
 Bien peu de jours après pour l'hymen fit compléte
 Diane Dame Charmante et d'agréable humeur,
 Riche, de noble race, enfin toute parfaite ;
 Et malgré les honneurs d'un état florissant,
 Ce qui n'est pas commun, il fut reconnaissant.*

LE BAISER RENDU

à Paris chez De Lamoignon, graveur du Roy rue des Sourdais à la s'porte cochon qu'onche entrant par la rue St Jacques A.P.D.R.

*Du baiser qu'il obtint le souvenir l'exalte
 A vouloir qu'aucun soit Madame l'on acquite
 De ce trait généreux le Monarque enchanté
 Et qui n'attendoit pas tant de fidélité
 S'exclame Ah que ma sœur aurait été Complète
 Si Monsieur eût voulu coucher avec Lizette!*

25b. LE BAISER RENDU. Engraving by Pierre Fillœul, 1736, after a missing painting by Jean-Baptiste Pater. Kupferstichkabinett, Staatliche Museen zu Berlin – Preussischer Kulturbesitz (Photo Jörg P. Anders).

Coyly bending forward from the waist, left foot forward, he turns his head sharply to the right to face Isabella, twisting his body into the shape of an S. With his right hand he blows a kiss to her, Bulwer's adoro, I love<sup>52</sup>; his left is rammed into the pocket of his breeches in order to secure his tricorne hat firmly under his arm.

Octavio's blond hair is held by a black velvet bow at the nape, a similar ribbon round his neck is tied in a bow at the front. Under a long, tail-coated jacket, he wears a tightly fitted doublet, flared from the waist, with gilt buttons down the front and two deep pockets on the flaps – a garment known in France since the seventeenth century as a justaucorps – made from heavily brocaded, gold-thread silk. A pleated white shirt cuff shows at the right wrist. The pink silk coat is trimmed at the sleeves and the curved edges with broad gold lace, frogged on one side. Gilt-edged pink breeches, white stockings, and black shoes with gold buckles and red heels complete the picture of eighteenth century dandy elegance. The usual rococo base with a rising scroll of support at the back is enhanced with gilding.

In the first century of European porcelain manufacture, up to about 1820, it was de rigueur in all factories to decorate each copy of a figure, having left the kilns in good order, in a distinctive manner. Different colour combinations were used and different textile fabrics were painted on each example. When examining Bustelli's comedy figures, at least those decorated in his lifetime, one comes to the conclusion that the modeller had insisted on the faithful likeness of the most costly contemporary materials for his creations, the finest silks, velvets and velours, the richest damasks and

DONNA MARTINA.

C.P. Maj.

I. Wachsmuth

26. DONNA MARTINA. German engraving signed C.P. Maj.-
I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin. – Mart. Engelbrecht exc. A.V., Augsburg. Mid-18th century. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome.

brocades, grosgrain's and taffetas, the sheerest muslins and lawns, the best cambrics and satins – in a word, the latest refinements of fashion. Thus, each figure became an unique work of art. The emphasis on sumptuousness, added to his superb modelling, is another reason why the corpus of Bustelli's figures and groups stands head and shoulders above all other baroque porcelain art.

Mons. Octavio appears at the extreme top right in Martin Engelbrecht's mid-eighteenth century engraving (fig. 5), with the bow at the throat, his justaucorps, flared coat, and the hat under his left arm. We know that Bustelli owned a copy of this print, so here we have the basic attire of his Octavio. The kiss-blowing episode could well have been inspired by the two engravings shown here.

Based on a verse by Jean de La Fontaine in Contes et nouvelles en vers which appeared in 1665, the painter Jean-Baptiste Pater (1695–1736) created two pictures LE BAISER DONNÉ (fig. 25a) and LE BAISER RENDU (fig. 25b). Both paintings are missing but, fortunately, the engravings of them, etched by Pierre Fillœul in 1736, have survived.

Donna Martina and the Dottore

Often playing the role of the Doctor's discontented wife, Donna Martina throws him a scornful look as she is about to turn away from his bombastic diatribes to go about her domestic duties. Bustelli's ingenuous modelling gift has invented two figures who relate to each other in their sinuous, dance-like convolutions, the convex curve of the one – his bulging paunch – corresponding to the concave one of the other – her hour-glass waist.

Donna Martina is the calm centre in the eye of the storm – the Commedia dell'Arte stage peopled with boisterous and often noisy contenders. In her role as the Dottore's wife, she is figuratively, as well as literally, buttoned up. Not greatly impressed by her inadequate husband, she treats him with icy contempt. In other roles, as confidante of Isabella, or as a housekeeper to one of the men, she is a quiet counsellor going about her business.

She stands, slightly leaning back on her left leg (fig. 27), head turned to the left, right foot forward, cradling a straw-clad

27. DONNA MARTINA. Height 19.7 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold on front plane of the base, impressed O. Kunstgewerbemuseum, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin (Photo Satoria Linke).

28. DOTTORE. Height 19.6 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold at rear of scroll support, incised 2. Bayerisches Nationalmuseum, Munich (formerly Sammlung Rothberger, Vienna).

29. LE DOCTEUR. Engraving by G.-D. de Geijn, 17th century. Duchartre Collection<sup>54</sup>.

flagon with a gold stopper in the crook of her left arm, the right hand raising the hem of her wide skirt in order to be on her way. She has a black ribbon in her blond hair and wears a pale rose-purple satin dress with an ample skirt, bordered at the hem by a wavy band of gold-thread embroidery fag-goted into palmettes. A diaphanous black lace wrapper over her shoulders, garnished with black flowers and leaves, and with applied roses at the throat and chest, allows wide linen cuffs to be seen at the wrists. A red slipper peeps out from under the skirt. To its left is the gold-bordered impressed and painted factory mark. The scroll base is edged in gold. Since 1959 we are aware that Franz Anton Bustelli obtained a number of the names for his figures from the engravings in figures 5 and 6, including that of Donna Martina (fig. 6) who, there, carries a mask in her right hand. This mask was later handed over to Columbine. We also know that these two engravings were assemblages by Martin Engelbrecht and that Donna Martina was taken by him from a Wachsmuth engraving (fig. 26) included in an earlier Augsburg series of twelve double pictures – amongst them figures 15 and 21. This series was also published by Martin Engelbrecht<sup>44</sup>. In Bustelli's porcelain figure of Donna Martina – which owes nothing whatever to these engravings except the name – the mask has been replaced by a wine flask. This flask had been an attribute of La Corinne in figure 5 and in the earlier Wachsmuth engraving of the same subject. Bustelli made such attributes interchangeable between the comedy characters, and at the time, they probably were. Doctor Baloardo avouched that he was a learned fellow of the venerable University of Bologna. He is usually referred to in the relevant literature by his Commedia dell'Arte name of the Dottore (fig. 28). In the Nymphenburg register of

30. MARC ANTONIO ROMAGNESI as LE DOCTEUR BALOUARDE. Engraving by Nicolas Bonmart (1637–1718), signed Chez N. Bonmart, rue St. Jacques à l'Aigle avec privil. – After 1694. With the verse (transl.): When the Doctor speaks, one wonders whether it is Latin or Low Breton, and often he who listens, interrupts him with a thrashing. Duchartre Collection<sup>55</sup>.

1767 he is simply listed as «Doctor». The man's very name is derived from the Italian balordo: a numbskull, a lumpish yokel, an awkward blunderer. At the top of figure 5 the name is Il Dottore Scatalon Bolognese, this one descended from the verb scaturire: to gush or to spout; and indeed, his role is that of a sententious, hypocritical ignoramus who spouts his long-winded homilies in excruciating dog Latin or claptrap St. Giles Greek, which neither he himself nor anybody else can understand. Ricoboni distinguishes between the costume of the Old Doctor, which he attributes to the original Italian Commedia, and that of the Modern Doctor, which he adopts for his Théâtre Italien in France<sup>53</sup>, but there is very little difference between the two. The Dottore and his friend, old Pantalone, head the two families around which most Commedia dell'Arte plots are constructed. Whilst Pantalone sired Isabella, the Dottore is the father of Capitano Spavento. Similarly to his old friend, the cuckolded Dottore consistently irritates and amuses the younger women of the cast with his unsuccessful improper advances. Apart from Bologna, he claims affiliation to most of the world's known and unknown universities. His peers, as much as his servants, make rude fun of him behind his back and tease him cruelly and insolently to his face, but he turns not a hair and continues to prattle on in his barbaric, fractured Latin or Greek. As for the Dottore's much vaunted medical skills, they may be judged by a little Commedia doggerel:

If you are ill – call him,
You will be sure not to survive.

Bustelli's Dottore struts about vaingloriously, yet his legs buckle weakly at the knees. His head is turned, questioning, to the right. The artist has modelled this swaggering actor to strike a pose which throws out his right hip and thus pushes the little pot-belly forward against his long waistcoat. His left hand is placed foppishly behind his back, whereas the right is raised with a pointed index finger tapping his forehead, at once pensive and mocking.

The costumes of both the old and the modern Dottore were made of plain black scholastic cloth, except for the collar. Both versions of the Dottore wore a curious short mask which covered only forehead and nose, and which is said to have been devised by one of the original sixteenth century actors who wished to disguise the blemish of a strawberry-mark on his brow. Henceforth, it was retained as an appurtenance of the Dottore's costume. Both doctors had their cheeks heavily daubed with rouge, to indicate their permanent state of agitation, and both wore trimmed pointed beards. These last two features were retained by Bustelli but, true to himself, he would not allow any of his figures – apart from Mezzetin – to wear masks; and with his Mezzetin he had a good reason. Instead, his Dottore wears a tight red headkerchief under the slouch hat, and the entire costume has been imaginatively brightened up and dandified, to conform to the tenets of the Bavarian rococo. The Dottore's academic black felt hat is huge, turned up at the front to lighten the face. Around his neck he has an accordion-pleated soft linen ruff, trimmed with yellow bobbles. He wears a black, three-quarter length broadcloth coat with short sleeves over a long-sleeved, knee-length waistcoat of fashionable silk, exquisitely striped in yellow and iron-red, with red turnups and white shirt cuffs at the wrists. The waistcoat is fastened down the front with gilt buttons. Black knee-breeches, white embroidered stockings and yellow, red-trimmed shoes complete the picture. The base is edged with gold.

There are many illustrations of the Dottore, going back as far as the sixteenth century. An early seventeenth century woodcut already shows him holding his academic's hat with his right hand.

The Dottore at the top of the engraving in figure 5 appears to be in the middle of a great storm of words. The full dog Latin oratory is visible in a seventeenth century engraving (fig. 29), where the Dottore holds up an open book – with blank pages – and has raised his left hand in the air, giving a two-finger sign to demand our attention. In this early image he still wears long, billowing trousers tied at the ankles with large bows. At the end of the century, before the 1697 expulsion from the Hôtel de Bourgogne, the costume, as described by Ricoboni thirty years later, had evolved to the contemporary scholastic attire, with either full black hose or black knee-breeches and stockings. The classic illustration of an actor wearing it is the engraving of Marc Antoine (or Antonio) Romagnese (fig. 30), who was one of the twelve comedians expelled by the King, and who died in Paris nine years later. We see him here in his role as Le Docteur Baulouarde, wearing the curious short mask covering his nose. He holds his wide-brimmed hat with the right hand. There are other similarities here with Bustelli's porcelain figure: the pleated ruff, the buttons down the front of his waistcoat, the long coat-tails. Bustelli has made the Dottore a rakish dandy – which, in the Italian Comedy, he certainly was not.

Lucinda and Pierrot

Lucinda is in the midst of a lovers' quarrel with Pierrot, caused by a misunderstanding about the meeting place of their midnight tryst. She is pointing in one direction, he prefers another, ready to lead the way with his little lamp. Lucinda is a friend of Isabella, but her role in the plots is a minor one. Her name is not known in the Italian Commedia dell'Arte. It might have been derived from one of the early seventeenth century Italian innamoratas, such as Lucia or Lucretia, humorously etched by Jacques Callot in 1622 for his Balli di Sfessania<sup>56</sup>. It could also have been developed from the role of Lucile, the name given to an amoureuse played by Gabriella Locatelli in the troupe of Giuseppe Bianchi, active in Paris in mid-seventeenth century<sup>57</sup>. Be that as it may, by the middle of the eighteenth century, the Théâtre Italien actually had a Lucinde in the cast. There is one playing the guitar at the top left of the Engelbrecht engraving in figure 6, of which Bustelli owned a print, but we think that he was more likely to have drawn ideas from the image of Mademoiselle Lucinde, Fille de Geronte, at top centre in figure 5, in order to name his Lucinda. Sieur Geronte, looking like yet another somewhat geriatric learned clerk, is seen at the top right in figure 6. He does not play any role amongst Franz Anton Bustelli's models.

In spite of their disaccord, Lucinda (fig. 31) turns her head to the left and looks longingly at her lover. Her body is inclined and turned to the right, and her right hand points in that direction. With her left she clutches a red rose, a gift of love from Pierrot, to her bosom. A fat beauty spot adorns her right temple. With an aigrette of red feathers in her blond hair, and a necklace of yellow beads tied by a large royal-blue bow at the throat, she wears a décolleté brocaded

31. LUCINDA. Height 20.6 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold on rise of the rococo scroll, impressed O. The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York (The Lesley and Emma Shaefer Collection, Bequest of Emma A. Shaefer, 1973).

MADemoiselle LUCINDE FILLE DE GERONIE.

C.P. Maj.

I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin.

M. Engelbrecht exc. A.V.

32. MADemoiselle LUCINDE FILLE DE GERONTE. German engraving signed C.P. Maj. – I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin. – M. Engelbrecht exc. A.V., Augsburg, mid-18th century. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome.

bodice with gilt buttons over a white muslin shirt that has wide cuffs. These garments are covered by an off-the-shoulder, flare-skirted housecoat or negligee with a deep pleat at the back. The coat is made of silk brocade, heavily embroidered with a colourful baroque pattern and bordered with pink silk faille. There are red bows, to match the rose, at the breast and the crooks of the arms. Lucinda's long, pleated skirt of finely spun wool is woven with a herring-bone pattern of gold and white thread on a blue ground, crossed by red diagonal lines. The hem is edged with gold braid. She wears white stockings and gilt-buckled, royal-blue slippers. The blue painted shield mark, outlined in gold, is placed inside the rising scroll of the base.

Engelbrecht's picture of Lucinde in figure 5 was a mirror-image copy of the earlier Wachsmuth engraving (fig. 32). Bustelli seems to have taken over the pointing gesture of the right hand, the aigrette in the hair, the bows at bosom and at the arms, possibly also something of the expectant look in her eyes. But Lucinda no longer carries a folded fan in her left hand and now more expressively clutches her red rose; but above all, the porcelain figure does not wear the old-fashioned pannier skirt which hides all movement beneath its rigid framework. Instead, Bustelli has modelled a woman who paces along lightly and sinuously in her modish house-coat and long, loose skirt.

33. PIERROT WITH HARLEQUIN. Dutch engraving by G. J. Xavery, published by Petrus Schenk, Amsterdam. 18th century. From The Amazing Illness, Duchartre Collection<sup>61</sup>.

34. PIERROT. Height 20.5 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold on the rising scroll behind, at the level of the knees, impressed O. Kunstgewerbemuseum, Staatliche Museen Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin (Photo Satoria Linke).

Pedrolino of the Commedia dell'Arte was renamed Pierrot in the Théâtre Italien of the eighteenth century. Generally, the role was that of a man-servant or valet of Pantalone. Ricoboni, whose illustration engraved by Joullain is entitled «The Habit of Pierrot», then explains in the text that his costume derives from the dress of Narcissino, a citizen of Bologna who is suited in the common habit worn in that town in the seventeenth century<sup>58</sup>. He also explains that Narcissino expressed himself in the language of the people of Bologna, as opposed to the high-flown accents of the spluttering Bolognian Doctor. It is interesting that Ricoboni attributes to the newly-named Pierrot not only the character of a simple-minded servant, but occasionally the role of a «father» who, although of higher rank, maintains his simplicity and ignorance<sup>59</sup>. Gentle Pierrot plays a languid, wistful young man and has a tendency to look like the eternal underdog who cannot say boo to a goose. Yet, poor and lovable as he appears, Pierrot is far from being helpless and often shows a high degree of resourcefulness. Whilst many of the girls pursue and tantalize him, he is really besotted with Julia; but considering her of a higher station in life to himself, he cautiously casts his amorous eyes on pretty Lucinda instead.

Pierrot is gazing longingly at her, his head turned sharply over his right shoulder. It is a moment of indecision, for she wants to turn to the right, whereas he points to the left, using the ancient hand signal of indico, «I point out»<sup>60</sup>. In his right hand, also directed towards the left, he holds a black iron lantern with a conical top to light them on their way (fig. 34).

35. SCARAMOUCHE-DIOGÈNE at the Paris Fair. Anonymous French engraving: 18th century. Duchartre Collection<sup>62</sup>.

In the seventeenth century Pedrolino was dressed from head to foot in white – even his face was whitened – and this tradition was upheld for the role of Pierrot in the eighteenth. Indeed, most Nymphenburg figures of Pierrot are kept almost entirely white, occasionally with a trim of blue edging to the hat and the clothes. The figure shown here was decorated more colourfully by the factory's painters – perhaps a nod in the direction of softer pastel colours employed in rococo art and also a hint as to the wistfulness of Pierrot's role. The round hat over golden locks is creamy-yellow. At the neck he has a wide frilled collar, edged with gold. His tight jacket with gilt buttons down the front, a black leather belt with a gold buckle around the waist, is pale mauve, tending towards pink, as are the narrow trousers ending above the ankles. His pointed slippers repeat the yellow of the hat and have red bows, red heels and thin red edges. The mark, painted and outlined in gold, is placed on the scroll support at the back, at a level with his knees.

In one of the eighteen engravings which illustrate the extraordinary Italian Comedy farce of Harlequin's pregnancy, listed at the end of the Bibliography, we see Pierrot giving advice to the newly delivered father. The position of arms and legs is almost exactly repeated in Bustelli's porcelain model (fig. 33). The Amsterdam engraver and publisher, Petrus (or Pieter) Schenk, the Younger (1698–1775) was most active in the first half of the eighteenth century, so it is quite likely that Bustelli had a set of these nine double-plates in his collection.

An unusual coincidence concerns the existence, also in the former Duchartre Collection, of an anonymous eighteenth century engraving of Scaramouche in the role of Diogenes, carrying a raree-show magic lantern on his back and a Diogenes dark-lantern in his right hand (fig. 35). Even the head movement and the walking stance show similarities with Bustelli's evidently more graceful and emotionally tender creation.

Mezzetin and Lalagé

When in 1921 Hofmann wrote his impressive history of the Nymphenburg factory, he had extracted from the 1767 Price List the names of sixteen figures which he correctly identified as Italian Comedy characters, even if they were not so designated in the List. He was now faced with fitting these names to figures in his Museum's or other public and private collections known to him. Considering the scant information on the Commedia dell'Arte available at the time, he solved this intricate puzzle with extraordinary aplomb.

36. ARLEQUIN SOUPIRANT. Probably Evariste Gherardi as the Sighing Harlequin. Engraving by Joullain père after Claude Gillot; sign.: Gillot inv./Joullain Sculp., c. 1720. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome (photo Oscar Savio).

Amongst the difficult decisions to be made were two figures, of which he knew several decorated examples and to whom the names of Harlequin and Columbine fitted eminently, since they both wore the parti-coloured, triangular patchwork costumes associated with those roles. But Hofmann had already identified a dancing Columbine among the sixteen figures, and he could not overlook the fact that Franz Anton Bustelli had modelled in 1757 a large Harlaquin, listed with his Harlaquinin in the 1760 Inventory of Moulds. The patchwork-clad figures would have to be named differently. With some hesitation, Hofmann selected Mesetin from the list of available names for the man, since he considered that this was the only figure in the set to which the time-honoured Commedia dell'Arte designation could be applied. So he named him Mezzetin, but with a reservation: «in the typical costume of Harlequin». Then there was the figure of the girl who seemed to belong to this Mezzetin with her equally patched costume, her dancing steps and body movements, which complemented his own. In addition there was the obvious fact that she was feeding gruel to the baby monkey in his arms. She was given the traditional Comedy name of Lalagé, possibly because the List had emphasized Lalagé, Pantomim-Figur. If these choices seem somewhat arbitrary, it must be remembered that Hofmann only had the list of sixteen names to attribute to the same number of figures and since, on the whole, his attributions seem to fit the figures reasonably well – with the exception perhaps of just the Mezzetin – his nomenclature has been retained to this day. The magnificent examples of Mezzetin and Lalagé illustrated here are in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, where a more recent interpretation has given them the names of Harlequin and Columbine, a fact respected in our captions.

37. MEZZETIN. Height 20.3 cm. Unpainted impressed shield mark at rear of scroll support. The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York (The Lesley and Emma Shaefer Collection, Bequest of Emma A. Shaefer, 1973) MMA HARLEQUIN.

38. LALAGÉ. Height 20 cm. Impressed white shield mark with traces of gold outlines to the right of the right foot. The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York (The Lesley and Emma Shaefer Collection, Bequest of Emma A. Shaefer, 1973) MMA COLUMBINE.

39. HARLEQUIN WITH MEZZETIN. Dutch engraving by G. J. Xavery, published by Petrus Schenk, Amsterdam, 18th century. From The Amazing Illness, Duchartre Collection<sup>63</sup>.

Again Bustelli has modelled a superb pair of figures, interacting in their coordinated dancing steps. Mezzetin's upper body bends forward whilst his right hip is thrown back, thus forming a concave curve in space. This is paralleled by the convex lines of Lalagé's right hip, thrown forward and underlined by the suggestion of a small pannier beneath her wide skirt. Whereas Mezzetin anxiously clasps the swaddled monkey to his breast, Lalagé's posture and outspread arms express mockery mingled with loving care.

The role of Mezzetin originated in the earliest Commedia dell'Arte companies in Italy. Subsequently, Mezzetin became a staple character in the Théâtre Italien, and indeed in all the later troupes. Yet another of Octavio's servants, he is Harlequin's companion and fellow schemer of extravagant buffooneries but, whereas Harlequin is the scurrilous master of skulduggery, Mezzetin is more of a cunning sentimentalist, a shrewd and artful operator behind the scenes. The original costume for the role consisted of an outfit of red-striped white silk jacket, breeches, coat and cap, but this does not apply to Bustelli's figure which – to adhere to Hofmann's definition – was dressed in the costume of Harlequin. Perhaps, he should have said: «disguised as Harlequin». What is more, the Nymphenburg Mezzetin has taken over one of the most irreverent roles ever devised for the personage of Harlequin, a role which in fact eminently suits the crafty and audacious character of a Mezzetin. In this connotation, Hofmann has instinctively conferred a fitting name to a figure which, at first sight, could only be taken for yet another Harlequin.

Mezzetin stands with the left foot placed on a tree stump behind him (fig. 37) and before a rising scroll support. His upper body is bent forward, with the right hip thrust out. He is dandling in his arms, and looking anxiously at the swaddled figure of a baby monkey. Mezzetin is the only one of Bustelli's sixteen comedy figures to wear a black leather half-mask, hiding the upper part of his face. The reason for this departure from his usual insistence on unmasked faces, we suspect, may be found in the engraved model shown below (fig. 39). Mezzetin's harlequinade costume has him wearing a cream-coloured round, feathered hat with a red pattern of triangles around the inner rim, thus crowning him with a glowing sunburst. At the neck, he wears a pleated lace collar. His gilt-buttoned, hip-length and close-fitting jacket, and the long trousers, are made up of triangular yellow, white, brown and iron-red patches; a slapstick is slipped inside a brown leather belt, and the baby monkey is swathed in white clothes with blue crenelated piping. The same blue piping also edges Mezzetin's garments and his hat. On his feet there are red-trimmed yellow shoes with gold buckles.

40. MASQUE EN HABIT D'ARLEQUINE. Engraving published by Martin Engelbrecht (1684–1756), Augsburg. Sign.: C.Pr.S.C.Maj./M. Engelbrech Sc. et exc. a.v. Private Theatre Collection.

The flat scroll base is enhanced with gilding, and an undecorated shield mark is impressed halfway up the scroll support at the rear. There are no impressed or incised marks under the base.

We can perceive a mock-solemn tenderness for his small bundle behind Mezzetin's half-mask and in the hunch of his shoulders. This expression of solicitude is reflected in the pronounced body language of the Sighing Harlequin (fig. 36), originally engraved by the French artist Claude Gillot (1673–1722), the master of Watteau, who was deeply involved in the Paris theatre of his time. Since Bustelli dressed Mezzetin in the costume of Harlequin, it is not unlikely that he also used engravings of that character for inspiration, but the spirited torsion of the porcelain figure's body is the modeller's own interpretation of Mezzetin's concerns.

As for the monkey, we can find a precedent by going back to the outrageous and hilarious Italian Comedy spoof of the pregnant Harlequin in The Amazing Illness... in which, in Scene V, a masked Harlequin suckles the only baby boy surviving from the triplets, of whom he had recently been delivered (fig. 39). Here the connection is too close to be ignored; with a nod towards the mid-eighteenth century fashion for singerie, Bustelli's whimsey has substituted a monkey for the baby, making the scene even more grotesque. He must have owned copies of this set of Petrus Schenk engravings (see also fig. 34) and, here too, we have a small hint of the link with a real Mezzetin giving his advice. We have discussed earlier how Hofmann named Lalagé as a match and partner to Mezzetin. The role of Lalagé (fig. 38) seems to have been created after the Commedia dell'Arte had crossed the Alps into France. Alter ego to Harlequina, she also acted the role of a servant-girl, but rather of the artless, ingenuous kind who likes to lurk in corners with her friends, to gossip behind their hands. In the present instance, Bustelli has made her the loving if loquacious help-mate of Mezzetin.

She is dancing around him, left foot forward, her head inclined to the right, smilingly waving a spoon in a raised right hand with which to stuff porridge from a purple decorated Nymphenburg dish in her left down the monkey's gullet; the animal's mouth is wide open expectantly. Lalagé's right hip is thrust out, the bulge exaggerated by the pannier beneath her skirt. Once more, Bustelli's modelling of flowing movement and refreshingly irregular but complementary lines has created a splendidly picturesque pair of figures. Lalagé's little red-edged, pale yellow hat with a red feather sits perched on her wavy blond locks, her lips are parted engagingly, and she has a pleated black riband around the neck, tied with a bow at the throat. Over a white ruffled and décolleté shirt with white cuffs at the wrists, she wears a wasp-waisted bodice that mirrors Mezzetin's costume, the triangles of her patches being iron-red, yellow, blue and black, with a blue bow at the cleavage. The ankle-length white linen skirt has an intricate hem embroidered with green-bordered semi-lunes of coloured patches alternating with yellow-ground diaper patterns, all surmounted by pink-purple chrysanthemum blooms with green leaves. Lalagé's stockings are white, her white shoes with gold buckles and red heels are trimmed with blue. The impressed shield mark to the right-hand side of the right foot has traces of gold outlines; the flat scroll base is decorated with gold.

The representation of Lalagé at the top of the engraving in figure 6 is copied from an earlier anonymous print (fig. 54). Neither bear any similarities to Bustelli's figure. Only a rare, early 18th century Engelbrecht engraving of Harlequina (fig. 40) seems to suggest itself as a possible model by the movements of the hands and the feet.

Capitano and Leda

Captain Spavento pretends to be a fearful warrior – after all, spavento is the Italian word for fright or scare. He is Octavio's rival for the hand of Isabella and, for reasons of his own, he advances menacingly on the timid figure of Leda, who is an intimate friend of his heart's desire. Crying out in fear, defensively raising her right hand, she yet looks upon her pretended aggressor with the tender eye of one who knows his anguish and his weaknesses. Once more, Bustelli has known how to create two figures which are closely paired in the orchestration and flow of their movements, and in the mutually complementary expressions on their faces. Ricoboni illustrates both the «Italian» and the «Spanish» Captains<sup>64</sup> in his History. The first was popular in the original Commedia dell'Arte, but as early as the embattled visits of the Emperor Charles V to Italy in the first half of the sixteenth century, the Spanish role started to replace the Italian one and eventually superseded it completely. As Ricoboni put it, the new Captain was a braggart who finished up by being beaten with Harlequin's slapstick. The change to a Spanish costume may have been occasioned by the Emperor's Spanish contingents being victorious over the French armies of Francis I, although it is evident that the costume of Bustelli's Capitano is rather fanciful compared with the uniform of a sixteenth century Spanish officer.

Octavio's rival is often assumed to be the Dottore's son, and plays his role in that capacity. It is difficult to understand the Bolognese origins of a captain in the Spanish occupation armies at Naples, but that, in essence, is just another of the contradictions one comes across in the Commedia dell'Arte. The Capitano's role is not an enviable one. A hero who runs at the sight of a mouse, a secret tippler, he desperately wants to conquer Isabella, and covers his doubts and weak-kneed character with swaggering, and supposedly fearless and irre-

IL CAPITANO SPAVENTO NAPOLITANO.

C.P. Maj.

I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin.

Mart. Engelbrecht exc. A.V.

41. IL CAPITANO SPAVENTO NAPOLITANO. German engraving signed C.P. Maj. – I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin. – Mart. Engelbrecht exc. A.V., Augsburg, mid-18th century. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome.

sistible behaviour. But Harlequin and Mezzetin see through all this martial demeanour, this bombast and grandiloquence, and when this horrid swordsman waves his Toledo rapier about, fit to poke out somebody's eyes, they counter with their clacking, flexible slapsticks and send him packing. In some plots the Capitano's name is given as Spezza ferre – the iron-cruncher – and the stanza under a seventeenth century engraving of him in Duchartre<sup>65</sup> tersely portrays his character: «Spezza ferre» is tough with the sword, but it is nothing but braggadocio!

Advancing, right foot forward, a fierce expression on his highly coloured face and his head turned to the left, the Capitano has drawn a steel dagger, which he brandishes in his right hand (fig. 43). The left clutches his feathered tricorne hat which threatens to fly off during his impetuous progress. Since Bustelli often amused himself by including Neapolitan hand-signs in the modelling of his figures, this gesture could also be construed, most appropriately, as impatientia prodo, I feel impatient<sup>66</sup>. The flat rococo base and the scroll support at the back are enriched with purple enamel and gilding. The costumes of many Nymphenburg figures of the Capitano have been painted in their essentials very similarly to a Spezzafer costume, dated 1668, as described by Sand<sup>67</sup>. In the present case, the Capitano wears a gilt-buttoned, red-trimmed jerkin and similar breeches made of bright yellow worsted cloth. Slung over his shoulders is an iron-red three-quarter sleeved, gold-bobbed pelerine lined in white, with an embroidered white lawn collar.

A sword is suspended from a yellow leather belt at his left side. In the illustrated example, the handguard of the hilt is missing. White hose and black turn-down topboots complete the martial outfit.

Bustelli's figure of the Capitano must be considered as an amalgam of personal observation of actors in a company of strolling comedians and additionally, of numerous drawings and engravings. Every Commedia dell'Arte troupe had a Captain in the cast, and the number of illustrations is extensive. The representation at top right in figure 5 was purloined by Martin Engelbrecht from a drawing by I. Wachsmuth which the very same Engelbrecht had published short-

42. CAPITANO. Watercolour by Ludovico O. Burnacini. Early 18th century. Oesterreichisches Theatermuseum, Vienna.

43. CAPITANO SPAVENTO. Height 19.2 cm. Impressed shield mark, incised O. Private Collection.

44. LEDA. Height 19.8 cm. Impressed white shield mark outlined in gold on left rise of scroll base, impressed O. Museum für Kunst und Gewerbe, Hamburg.

45. SCENE NO. 5 of an Italian Comedy sequence of twelve Augsburg engravings depicting «AMOR VEHEMENTER QUIDEM FLAGRANS», Sign.: Joh. Jacob Schübler del. – Joh. Balth. Probst Sculpsit – Cum Pr. Sac. Caes. Maj. – J. M. Probst Haered Jer. Wolffj excud. Aug. V. From the 1750 Edition. The Institute for Theatre, Cinema and Television Research, University of Cologne (Niessen Collection).

tly before (fig. 41). It shows a costume and a cloak with big bobbles, similar to the porcelain figure. The similarities end there. There is also the traditional two-handed sword which goes with the role, but Bustelli had discarded that and replaced it with a more elegant rapier. A dashing figure is cut by the Capitano in a watercolour by Ludovico Burnacini (fig. 42), but Bustelli is unlikely to have known this. On the other hand, engravings of Captains in like stances must have abounded in mid-18th century, and many of them wore the same pouch-shaped headgear, more reminiscent of the cap worn by Scaramouche. Such a baggy-hatted Captain is declaiming in the Schübler engraving (fig. 45), his attitude approaching that of the porcelain figure. He is being applauded here by Pantalone, with a startled Tartaglia listening open-mouthed, and Harlequin mocking him in the background. Again, there is the clumsy two-handed sword, and instead of a dagger, the Capitano waves about a wooden bat in his right hand.

In spite of the distinction made between «del» and «sculpsit» under each sheet, both Joh. Jacob Schübler and Joh. Balthasar Probst contributed to the composition of this series of twelve engravings, Schübler being responsible mainly for the scenic and architectural backgrounds and Probst for gathering together the participants in each scene, principally from earlier sources<sup>68</sup>. The series was first published by Jeremias Wolff in 1729<sup>69</sup>. Balthasar Probst was the father of Joh. Michael Probst, art dealer and editor, who took over the firm on his father's death in 1750, and published a second, and later, further editions of the set. Balthasar himself was also the son-in-law of Jeremias Wolff, and his successor. The same series was used extensively as models for the Italian Comedy figures created by Wenzel Neu at the porcelain factory in Kloster Veilsdorf, Thuringia, in the mid-1760's. It is no wonder that the Capitano approaches Leda aggressively. He wishes her to intercede on his behalf with Isabella, of whom she is a very close friend. Leda is a tender, attractive

Joh. Jacob Schübler del. Joh. Balth. Probst Sculpsit Cum.Pr.Sac. Caes. Maj. Haered Jer. Wolffj excud. A. V.

46. SCENE NO. 3 of an Italian Comedy sequence, as in figure 45.
 Sign.: J.M.Probst – Joh.Jacob Schübler del. – Joh. Balth. Probst Sculpsit – Cum.Pr.Sac. Caes.Maj. – Haered Jer. Wolffj excud. A.V.
 From the 1750 Edition. The Institute for Theatre, Cinema and Television Research, University of Cologne (Niessen Collection).

girl, and we can see that she dresses in the height of fashion, like her elegant playmate. Hofmann states that the naming of this figure had been somewhat arbitrary, but that, in expression and in movement, she was the obvious companion piece to the Capitano<sup>70</sup>. Her role is to listen to his violent outpourings and then, after a few stormy encounters, to calm his tortured ardour. The timidity, which she displays at first, will help to cool the Capitano's agitation, and gently guide him into her own welcoming arms. Indeed, Bustelli's now familiar finger-movement of her raised right hand is not so much repelling him, as to signal pacificat, she appeases<sup>71</sup>. Her head is turned to the right to face him, open-mouthed, the left hand gathering up her skirt, as if to flee (fig. 44).

Leda's blond curls drop over her right shoulder, her hair is held back with a blue bow at the nape of the neck and adorned with a red rose. A pearl necklace is bound at the throat with another blue rosette. Under the bodice with a very low neckline, she wears a shirt with a frilled collar and pleated, turned-back cuffs at the wrists. The bodice itself is made of yellow cloth, gallooned at the front and around the edges with ultramarine blue riband; an ample skirt of purple moiré silk swings from her hips, with the outline of her left leg clearly defined beneath, and with blue embroidery of waves-and-rosettes at the hem. Her yellow slippers are also edged in blue. The scroll and wave base and rococo support are enhanced with gilding.

Almost identically attired as the one in figure 45, the Capitano in the next illustration (fig. 46) is advancing boldly towards the main actress in the composition. Here, the Harlequin is even more shamelessly flippant than before, and there are other actresses, thus a Columbine playing a lute. By the attention which she confers on the Capitano, we can tentatively identify the central figure as Leda. Her hand movements are vaguely reminiscent of the figure which was modelled by Bustelli who, however, did not deign to take over the extravagant head-dress or the over-elaborate bodice and mantle.

SCARAMUTIJS, PANTOMIMUS, THEATRALI PLAUSU DIGNISSIMUS.

47. SCARAMUTIJS, PANTOMIMUS, THEATRALI PLAUSU DIGNISSIMUS. Dutch engraving by Petrus Schenk (1660–1718/19), Amsterdam, early 18th century. Sign.: Pet. Schenck fec: et exc. Amstelod.:/Manil.5 lib.Astronom./ cum Privil.: The Royal Library, Copenhagen.

Scaramouch and Columbine

The minuet continues as Scaramouch dances and counter-dances round the bubbling and capering figure of Columbine. There is no doubt that in Bustelli's imagination, these two were conceived as a pair revolving one around the other, dancing in step. Their movements complement each other, and they gaze into one another's eyes to the total exclusion of the world around them.

The two Neapolitans, Scaramouch and Pascariel, claim the same descent, namely that of replacing, at the end of the seventeenth century, the Spanish Captain who had, it appears, become obsolete in the Commedia dell'Arte in Italy. Ricoboni tells us that the costume, all black with a large white collar, was an imitation of the Spanish suit of clothes worn for a long time in the town of Naples by the people of the Palace, the Judges and the Soldiers<sup>72</sup>. Whilst in Italy, Scaramouch played only the role of the boastful coward and braggart of a Captain, in France, he was made to impersonate a variety of characters. In England, the role, in this later version, was introduced soon after 1670, and a Neapolitan actor by the name of Tiberio Fiorelli came to the country in 1673 and amazed the public with his feats of agility. He acquired the sobriquet of Scaramouch Fiorelli<sup>73</sup>. In May 1688, at the age of ninety years, he returned to Paris to join the new Italian Troupe formed by Marc Antonio Romagnesi and again play the role of Scaramouch until his retirement in May 1694. He was replaced by Messina-born Joseph Tortoriti (see fig. 3). Fiorelli died in December 1694<sup>74</sup>.

48. SCARAMOUCHE. German engraving published by Johann Jacob Wolrab (1675–1746), Nuremberg, c. 1720. The Institute for Theatre, Cinema and Television Research, University of Cologne (Niessen Collection).

In the eighteenth century, Scaramouch acquires a more defined place in the plots of the Théâtre Italien and, hence, in the companies which visited the palaces and the fairgrounds of Europe. He now impersonates another Neapolitan-born servant of Octavio or of one of the equivalent characters of the Lover.

He fools around with Harlequin and Pierrot, and thus comes into closer contact with Columbine – at most times forbidden territory. Now he is often seen to play romantic melodies on his mandoline, and in addition becomes known as an accomplished mimic. At times chicken-hearted and something of a coward, he quietly withdraws into the shadows to observe and remember the action from afar. But his name does not derive in vain from the Italian scaramuccia, the skirmish. When the occasion is right, Scaramouch can portray a swashbuckling gallant, and an excellent swordsman to boot.

Bustelli's Scaramouch (fig. 51) diverts us with his winged dancing step, the left sturdy leg raised up, the right hand, in a greeting gesture, touching his cap. His left hand and wrist are concealed beneath the tail of a short coat. Since the seventeenth century, the typical costumes of both Scara-

50. MEZZETINO. French engraving by Jean Mariette, Paris, late 17th century. Private Theatre Collection.

49. SCARAMOUCHE. Dutch engraving, with eight lines of comic verse below (not shown), early 18th century. Print Collection, Library of Congress, Washington D.C.

mouch, and his alter ego, Pascariel, are black from cap to shoes, the «Spanish» suits of Naples. We need only think of the actor Joseph Tortoriti, in the role of Pascariel, attired totally in black in the scene of the 1697 Expulsion, at bottom left of figure 3. The decoration of our porcelain model has kept closely to this tradition<sup>72</sup>. Scaramouch's floppy black velvet beret is placed on a white head-scarf. He has a goffered white muslin collar at the neck, and wears a tight-fitting, gold-buttoned black cloth jacket over his distinctly bloated stomach. A yellow sash around the waist is tied on the right hip. Black knee-breeches have bows at the joints. A short black coat falls from his shoulders. White hose over strongly muscled calves, and black, buckled shoes complete this time-honoured outfit. It should be noted that the costume demanded in addition that the face of Scaramouch be whitened, with painted eyebrows and moustaches. The Nymphenburg decorators generally observed this convention, although sometimes applying rouge to the cheeks. The scroll base and support are very lightly gilded. But the decorators did not always adhere strictly to the traditional costume. In the spirit of Bustelli's rococo style, examples of Scaramouch are known to wear costumes painted in subdued colours, other than black. On a model of Scaramouch in the Bavarian National Museum in Munich, the jacket is painted to simulate a fine grey cloth with black frogging and black embroidery of flowers and scrolls, the sash being white with black stripes.

51. SCARAMOUCH. Height 19.6 cm. Impressed shield mark on scroll support, impressed O. Bernisches Historisches Museum, Bern (photo S. Rebsamen).

52. LA SIGNORA ISABELLA. Dutch engraving by G. Valck of the Ballerina «Isabella» Biancolelli, sign.: G. Valck ex., 18th century. Print Collection, Rijksmuseum, Amsterdam.

Joseph Tortoriti's portrayal of Scaramouch first found expression in a 1696 pen-and-ink drawing by Bernard Picart

(1673–1733), now in the Cabinet des Dessins at the Louvre in Paris<sup>74</sup>. A mirror image engraving of this sketch, entitled Joseph Tortoriti faisant le personnage de Scaramouche, was published in the same year by Jean Mariette of Paris. Early in the eighteenth century, the ever busy Amsterdam copyist Petrus Schenk engraved a mirror image of the Paris print, thus reversing back to the figure's progress from right to left of Picart's presentation (fig. 47). Scaramouch is shown in his customary black habit, which included a curious piping at the edge of the jacket, not retained by Bustelli. The flopping beret, the pleated collar, the short coat and the knee-

53. COLUMBINE. Height 20.6 cm. Impressed blue and white shield mark outlined in gold on rising scroll support on the right. Kunstgewerbemuseum, Staatliche Museen. Preussischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin.

54. LALAGÉ. Anonymous French engraving from a series of fourteen, each with a Latin quotation, c. 1720. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome.

breeches are all present. Also discernable are Tortoriti's legendary hefty calf muscles, which certainly reappear on the porcelain figure. This engraving does not show the actor's equally notorious pot-belly. He carries the mandoline with which he often accompanied his musical ditties.

In the notes on the engraved Pantalone of figure 19, we have already discussed the importance to eighteenth century porcelain modellers of fourteen engravings of the Italian Comedy, published by Wolrab around 1720. It is most likely that Franz Anton Bustelli possessed such a set, for his Scaramouch shows distinct features seen on the analogous engraving (fig. 48). The dancing stance is identical, there is a similar embonpoint and there are the vigorous calves of Tortoriti. A modeller of Bustelli's ingenuity and invention would evidently use features from more than one two-dimensional likeness in order to create a figure in the round, yet one feels that the Wolrab engraving is the nearest in scene-setting to the porcelain Scaramouch.

Other likenesses do exist. Amongst a set of engravings portraying thirty-two actors and comedians playing musical instruments or singing, by an unidentified engraver, is a Mezzetin or Scaramouch impersonation with familiar features (fig. 49), apart from the position of the left leg. Here the right hand is similarly raised, the left drawn back, albeit without the cover of the coat-tail. However, the loose flouncing at the bottom of the knee-breeches is inconsistent with a Scaramouche costume.

The same flouncing appears on yet another Mezzetin-like etching published by Jean Mariette (fig. 50), in which the dancing step is identical. There is no reason why Bustelli, who clad his own Mezzetin in the costume of Harlequin, should not lay claim to the movements of a Mezzetin for his Scaramouch.

The name of Columbine is a derivation from the Italian colomba, the dove, but her role is not that of an altogether

COLOMBINE.
So will ich den nur sehn, wer mich doch endlich kriegt! Mein wandelbarer Sinn, bringt von Natur schon mit
Weil so viel Töchter sich gewaltig um mich reißen. Daß ich von einem nur flugt auf den andern, sehn:
Indessen werd ich nie nur einem eigen heissen. Drum wird es nicht gewiß bey meinem auch gesehen Indem der Wechsel mir sehr im Kopfe liegt. Daß manchmal seine Stell ein anderer vertritt.

55. COLOMBINE. German engraving published by Johann Jacob Wolrab (1675–1746), Nuremberg, c. 1720. The Institute for Theatre, Cinema and Television Research, University of Cologne (Niessen Collection).

dovelike young woman. Columbine appears quite early in the history of the Commedia dell'Arte, as a maid for Isabella or one of the other inamorata in the household of Pantalone. Together with that of her mistress, her role was one of the first to be played by an actress in a hitherto totally male-dominated theatre. In the seventeenth century Columbine would, in addition, double as a ballerina in musical intermezzos woven into the performances. As a counterpart to Harlequin, with whom she made common cause to cheat on Pantalone, the role demanded a wily and impertinent character, but also cheeky pertness. Although her enduring love was for fickle Harlequin, she was an inveterate flirt – as here, in Bustelli's version, she uses her charms on Scaramouch – and often she was the decoy to lead Pantalone, and also the besotted lover of Isabella, by the nose.

Matching her dance-step to that of Scaramouch, right foot forward, Columbine (fig. 53) turns her head and inclines her

HARLEQUINE.
Mein Mann der Harlequin, der ertzgeriffte Pfeiff. Er waffte mir, das allmal nach einen Courtyfen Schwarze Tug und Nichte herum und lebt in vollem Saufe. Wer mir die Zeit verdrückt und Geld zum Dant spendet.
Drum bleib ich ehnfals nun langer nicht zu Hauße. Ich wuß auch daß das Glück bald einen zu mir führet.
Denn mir kompt stetig auch ein Luffchen in den Ruff. Weil solchen Vögeln ich gar artig pfeiffen kan.

56. HARLEQUINE. German engraving published by Johann Jacob Wolrab (1675–1746), Nuremberg, c. 1720. The Institute for Theatre, Cinema and Television Research, University of Cologne (Niessen Collection).

upper body to the right, her right hand lightly lifting the hem of her skirt, the left arm raised with a black half-mask in her hand. Perched on her tightly curled blond hair, at a dangerous angle, sits a blue-trimmed, yellow hat with a blue feather, a costume attribute of her role, as is the mask. It is to be noted that Bustelli has not made her wear the mask so that we can see her facial expression, and the beauty spots which adorn her left temple and her chin. A blue accordion-pleated ruff encircles her neck modestly – contrary to her fellow-servant Lalagé, whose similar costume is very décolleté. The yellow silk, wasp-waisted bodice is trimmed with blue ribbon and gilt buttons. Her wrists emerge from white muslin shirt sleeves. There are blue bows at the breast and the wrists. The ample red-purple skirt of watered silk is bordered near the hem with gold passementerie, and the folds in the front are moulded by the outline of Columbine's right leg. The skirt is lined with green taffeta, the slippers are purple with blue bows. The rococo scroll base is enriched with gilding and combed blue enamel.

Columbine's secondary role is best illustrated by a portrait of the ballerina Catharina Biancolelli, called Isabella (fig. 52). She was the daughter of Domenico Biancolelli from Bologna, the Harlequin in the Fiorelli-Locatelli Troupe of 1653–1684<sup>75</sup>, in which she danced and also played the Columbine. When the new Paris troupe was created in May 1688 by Marc Antonio Romagnesi, both Domenico and his daughter joined it, the father again as Harlequin, the daughter as Isabella. As we know, she was present as the Columbine nine years later, at the Expulsion of 1697. In 1739, Teresa Biancolelli, a member of the next generation of this illustrious family, joined Louis Ricoboni's troupe at the Hôtel de Bourgogne as his Columbine<sup>76</sup>.

No painting or engraving could have greatly influenced the independence of Franz Anton Bustelli, for his creations were always imbued by the spirit of his own genius, and by his belief in and the practice of the forms of the Bavarian rococo. But Bustelli would not offend against a body of time-honoured usage, and his comedy figures retain many features traditional to their roles in the Théâtre Italien. Columbine has her mad little hat pinned to her hair at a dangerous angle, she carried a mask in her hand, and she plucks at her skirt to raise the hem – all these features are present in the early engraving of Lalagé (fig. 54), standing stiffly in a garden landscape which owes nothing to the Commedia dell'Arte. We know that Lalagé was often cast to take over the roles of other comédiennes, as she has here, and as she has been embodied by Bustelli.

The Columbine which J. J. Wolrab published at about the same time, around 1720 (fig. 55), would only have the mask to identify her role, were it not for the caption below. This print cannot then have had any impact on Bustelli's model. In the same series of fourteen vignettes portraying Italian or. et delin.

SIEUR ANSELMO.

Mart. Engelbrecht exc. A.V.

57. SIEUR ANSELMO. German engraving signed: C.P.Maj. – I. Wachsmuth inv. et delin. – Mart. Engelbrecht exc. A.V., Augsburg, mid-18th century. Raccolta Teatrale del Burcardo, Rome.

Comedy troupers, there is however a Harlequina (fig. 56) who not only has the same little feathered hat attached to her curls, but from whom the modeller might also have adopted the ruff at the neck, the wasp-waisted, flared bodice and the bows adorning the bust and the wrists; even the footwork is familiar, but Franz Anton Bustelli left no notes on the subject of his day-to-day work.

Anselmo and Corinne

The last actress at bottom left in figure 5 is La Corinne, and Sieur Anselmo stands at the top right in figure 6. Franz Anton Bustelli chose the names for his figures from these engravings. Looking closely, we discover that Corinne holds a plaited-straw covered wine flask in her right hand, an attribute which Bustelli took away from her and transferred to his Donna Martina. The porcelain figure of Corinne has nothing in common with the engraved image. The case is slightly more flexible with Sieur Anselmo, for he has at least a three-quarter length cloak and the walking stick in common with the porcelain model. Both the portrayals in the two engravings were copied by Engelbrecht from the slightly earlier double-images engraved by I. Wachsmuth (fig. 58), which could also have been in Bustelli's private portfolio of prints. In the 1767 Pricelist, the girl's name is spelled «Corine» which Hofmann rightly qualified as a printer's error but – not being aware of the Wachsmuth-Engelbrecht engravings, nor the subsequent Engelbrecht assemblages – he thought that the name should have read «Clorinde», the designation of a role known in the Italian Comedy<sup>77</sup>. By way of the engravings in question, we realize now that the character-role was indeed called Corinne, possibly one of the many variants of Corallina<sup>78</sup>. Hofmann also mooted the question whether Anselmo might not have been meant to portray the role of Narcissino de Malalbergo, a low-class servant from Bologna, illustrated by Ricoboni<sup>79</sup>, whose costume looks very similar to that of Anselmo, a theory which can now be abandoned.

Anselmo and Corinne, the last pair in the set of sixteen figures, are perhaps the least typical in their portrayal of Commedia dell'Arte actors. Weak-kneed Anselmo shuffles faint-heartedly up to the pretty girl, who completely ignores his approach, whilst her attention is rivetted to the letter in her hand.

The role of Anselmo (fig. 59) is not too clearly defined in the literature on the Italian Comedy. It may only have evolved after the return of the commedianti to Paris in 1716, and could well have been modelled on the seventeenth century archetype Abbé of Molière. Indeed the Nymphenburg porcelain figure is occasionally described as the Abbé, like the model illustrated here<sup>80</sup>. Anselmo has sometimes been cast to play a role similar to that of old Pantalone or that of the latter's friend, an elderly, lecherous dodderer. He has also played a servant to the avaricious Venetian merchant, then impersonating a teetering, prattling old bore. We see him walking hesitantly, leaning with his right hand on a brown cane and coming round a handsome, scrolled rococo support, slightly bent, with his head turned to the left. The left index finger is raised towards his mouth to express the Neapolitan silenzio, silence<sup>81</sup>, in order not to disturb Corinne.

A wide-brimmed, two-cornered black hat sits on his grey hair, his eyebrows and moustaches are painted onto his face, the cheeks are rouged to show his inner agitation. The short, sleeveless cloak, his long, buttoned jacket and his knee-breeches are made of a heavy woollen material, all in black, as are his buckled shoes. At the neck he has starched linen, lace-bordered «canonicals» – a clergyman's kerchief, a purple-edged white shirt sleeve peeps out of the left arm of the jacket. His stockings are white. The scroll support and the flat rococo base are enriched with apple-green enamel colour and gilding. Other models are known with a discreetly coloured, embroidered jacket under the black cloak.

The I. Wachsmuth engraving (fig. 57), used by Engelbrecht for his group picture, was not an original itself. The engraver borrowed almost all his images from earlier French sheets of Italian Comedy or Théâtre Italien actors, or from engrav-

58. L'ABBÉ. Painting in fresco by Josef Lederer on the ballroom wall of the Castle at Český Krumlov, Czech Republic, 1748. From Bohême.

59. ANSELMO. Height 18.5 cm. Impressed shield mark under the base, incised 2. By courtesy of Christie's, London (now in the Bayerisches Nationalmuseum, Munich).

60. CORINNE. Height 19 cm. Impressed shield mark on front scroll, under base script «Mad Col.» in black. By courtesy of Kunsthaus Lempertz, Cologne (formerly Sammlung Jahn).

ings after well-known French painters. Wachsmuth's Sieur Anselmo descends directly from the early eighteenth century engraving «La Coquette» by H. S. Thomassin fils after the painting by Antoine Watteau<sup>82</sup>, in which Anselmo stands, hat in hand, next to Columbine attended by Mezzetin and Donna Martina.

An amusing and somewhat libertine portrait of the Abbé ogling a cross-dressed gentleman is to be found on the ballroom wall of the Castle at Český Krumlov, about 145 km due south of Prague in the Czech Republic (fig. 58). It is unlikely that Bustelli could have had any knowledge of its existence. Prince Josef Adam von Schwarzenberg commissioned the Viennese painter Josef Lederer in 1748 to decorate the walls, loges, niches and recesses of this large, elegant room with trompe-l'œil frescoes<sup>83</sup>. In 189 days the artist painted 125 people all around the room. Amongst them we find the masked, seated figure of the Prince himself, numbers of masked and unmasked courtiers and their ladies, and other revellers, officers and soldiers belonging to the Prince's private army, the artist's self-portrait, a Chinaman and a Turk, a transvestite and men in Bohemian folk costumes; amidst them all are a number of beautifully rendered Italian Comedy characters: the Abbé, Pantalone and Pierrot, Scaramouch and Brighella, Mezzetin and, of course, Harlequin and Columbine<sup>84</sup>.

Corallina was presumably one of Isabella's urbane friends, another soubrette in the tumultuous and labyrinthine plots of the Commedia dell'Arte; we can deduct, therefore, that Corinne played a similar role in the Théâtre Italien in France and elsewhere. She has at times been thought to have played the part of yet another housemaid of one of the principals, but this would not apply to Bustelli's Corinne in view of the message in her billet-doux from the courtly, besotted Leandro, one of the amoureux. Different from her high and mighty girl-friends, she seems to be an attractive but reserved young woman.

Corinne (fig. 60) stands demurely before a rococo support, her left elbow leaning on its uppermost scroll, the left foot is slightly in front of the right, and her head is inclined to the right. In her hands she holds a letter inscribed: «Ricordato Della Parolo Promese Leander», remember the given word, Leandro. It is obvious that Bavarian porcelain painters were not very familiar with Italian grammar or spelling. Some models have been known with musical notes on the sheet, instead of the message. Corinne's blond hair is tied at the back with a pink riband, her head is covered with a white cap. Some models have a feather on the left of this cap. A small white ruff at her neck is tied with a pink bow. Over a décolleté white linen shirt with wide sleeves, she wears a buttoned pale blue, gold-bordered bodice brocaded with iron-red and other flowers and leaves, and having mauve bows on the sleeves. The pink satin skirt with a gold-bordered pale-grey ruche at the hem is partly covered with a black apron, ruched around three sides in darker grey and tied at the waist with yellow ribbon. She has white stockings and flower-embroidered, yellow-edged silk slippers with gold buckles. The scroll base is enhanced with gilding.

The mark, as with almost all models, is impressed on the upper side of the base on the front of a scroll but, curiously, under the base there is the black script notation «Mad Col.» – Mademoiselle Colombine. This is not the only model with such an inscription. In the 1925 sale of the Darmstaedter Collection<sup>85</sup>, the model of Corinne was catalogued as a Colombine and the black inscription read «Mad. Columb.». Both these inscriptions must have been applied before the publication of Hofmann's History of the Nymphenburg factory in 1921/1923. The Bustelli Columbine with the correct attributes (fig. 52) was well-known by then, and the Nymphenburg figure of «Corinne» had been identified by Hofmann. It is therefore surprising to find that the erudite cataloguer of the Darmstaedter auction sale, Prof. Schnorr von Carolsfeld, himself a connoisseur and museum expert of antique ceramics, was misled by the inscription under the base.

None of the prints portraying Corinne show the slightest features which could have been adopted by Bustelli for his porcelain figure. Apparently, he only used the name. The engraving with the name of Corinne in the French series with Latin quotations of 1720 shows a mincing lady with a Columbine-like hat perched on the side of her head and a ruff at the neck, but no other attributes. The unknown French engraver copied this image directly from an etching by P. Simmoneau fils after the painting of Comédiens by Antoine Watteau of c. 1710–1715. In this, the actress whom we call Corinne stands in front of a Columbine as shown in figure 13<sup>86</sup>. The mid-eighteenth century Wachsmuth print depicts a stoutish woman with a flask, a picture which was used by Engelbrecht for the group in figure 5. A model engraving of an unassuming young woman, reading a letter, has yet to be discovered, possibly an illustration of a scene from a romantic French melodrama.