All of the glasses I have washed for my friends
for the RosaRots

The water glasses out of which we drank cold beer when we met. I drank too fast, I got a buzz and the boundaries between us disappeared.

The coffee cups: a whole thrift shop's worth of novelty mugs, bottoms black with dregs.
(French-press.)

The wine glasses from dinner parties: spaghetti, red wine, like the time on Susanne's terrace.

There was only candlelight, it lit the glasses up like red orbs and all of our faces were glowing.

The little lovely espresso cups from breakfast at home:
we always drank too much coffee, and someone always brought a Zopf.

The water glasses out of which we drank Pernod with ice and a splash of water in the garden, it was Léa's birthday,
it was summer, she'd hung up garden lights and pinnyforees, it was one of the moments that was so lovely I thought I could die when it was over.
But of course I didn't, life kept going, and I unchanged and changed.

The water glasses
out of which we actually drank water, the summer that it was so hot and still and we sat around sweating on drafts.

The schnapps glasses out of which we drank the really good port Dolores brought back from Italy.
It was late, maybe one or two.
There were four of us in the kitchen.
The dishes were in the sink.
(Dolores had made a roulade with cabbage and feta.)
When she put the bottle
on the table
I was already ready to tell them
everything.
