

Zeitschrift: SPELL : Swiss papers in English language and literature
Herausgeber: Swiss Association of University Teachers of English
Band: 22 (2009)

Artikel: Pre-texts : essential ambiguities in textuality
Autor: Stanley, Eric
DOI: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-130943>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist die Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften auf E-Periodica. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Zeitschriften und ist nicht verantwortlich für deren Inhalte. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern beziehungsweise den externen Rechteinhabern. Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen sowie auf Social Media-Kanälen oder Webseiten ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Mehr erfahren

Conditions d'utilisation

L'ETH Library est le fournisseur des revues numérisées. Elle ne détient aucun droit d'auteur sur les revues et n'est pas responsable de leur contenu. En règle générale, les droits sont détenus par les éditeurs ou les détenteurs de droits externes. La reproduction d'images dans des publications imprimées ou en ligne ainsi que sur des canaux de médias sociaux ou des sites web n'est autorisée qu'avec l'accord préalable des détenteurs des droits. En savoir plus

Terms of use

The ETH Library is the provider of the digitised journals. It does not own any copyrights to the journals and is not responsible for their content. The rights usually lie with the publishers or the external rights holders. Publishing images in print and online publications, as well as on social media channels or websites, is only permitted with the prior consent of the rights holders. Find out more

Download PDF: 22.01.2026

ETH-Bibliothek Zürich, E-Periodica, <https://www.e-periodica.ch>

Pre-Texts: Essential Ambiguities in Textuality

Eric Stanley

The word pre-text is ambiguous. There is, first, the pretexta worn in Rome by those who had not yet advanced to the toga virilis. Secondly, the word means “pretence,” spelt pretense in the United States, and so confusable with pre-tense (if there is such a word), perhaps part of the verbal paradigm. Thirdly, a pre-text may be a text before the text; if so, there may be also a post-text, a text after the text. Some medieval texts may show pre-textual and post-textual complexity, and in this paper Sir Gowther and Gregorius are used to exemplify such textualities.

The Professor of Anglo-Saxon at Oxford when I was an undergraduate almost 60 years ago was C. L. Wrenn. He used to quote with some frequency the lines from Goethe’s Faust,

Grau, theurer Freund, ist alle Theorie,
Und grün des Lebens goldner Baum. (100, Studirzimmer [lines 2038-9]

[Grey, dear friend, is all theory, and green the golden tree of life.]

But Wrenn never told us that the speaker of these colourful words is Mephistopheles, and the person he is addressing is one of Dr Faust’s intellectually limited but eager pupils. Though I am not well up in theory,

The Construction of Textual Identity in Medieval and Early Modern Literature. SPELL: Swiss Papers in English Language and Literature 22. Ed. Indira Ghose and Denis Renevey. Tübingen: Narr, 2009. 17-32.

I have never dismissed it wholly in accord with this Mephistophelean generalization. I was wondering what a pre-text might be; what text, if the word describes a textual state, had one of these textual antecedents? Is there such a thing as post-textuality; should there not be?

Is it best to begin at the beginning of recorded English literature or at the end of the Middle Ages or the Renaissance? Is it wise to stray into some language other than English where textualities may have been better exemplified and understood in all their theoretical complexities? Answers to such questions are often best solved ambulando. Pretext, understood textually, shall be a guide. Modern linguists, post-structural and post-poststructural, invent their diction as heirs to a literary tradition well established by 1871, when Lewis Carroll published his Jabberwocky, that is Looking Glass nonsense poetry, now much discussed by theorists. The tradition took a serious turn in Franz Kafka's German. With him the technicality of being a Landvermesser, "surveyor," is crossed with Vermessensheit, "arrogance, presumption." The Dadaists similarly play with words that seem to have no ancestry, unless one is an etymologist. Thus ausmerzen, "to eliminate, eradicate," may have suggested to Kurt Schwitters the title of his magazine, Merz. This sounds like the linguistic parallel of the visual, optimistic playfulness of Paul Klee or Joan Miró. Dadaism, however, was gloomily pessimistic: at the beginning of the twentieth century, the first half of it perhaps, there was every reason to be gloomy. The Post-Poststructuralists in the second half of the twentieth century caught the manner, a mannerism, and some caught the gloom.

Now the word pretext. Two uses of this word, both Latin in origin, have come into English in the Renaissance. The dictionaries keep them strictly separated. Etymologically, they are one, however, distinguished only by their inflectional ending, so that etymologists (thus Walde and Hofmann II 678-9) take them together s.v. texō, "to weave, plait, construct with skill." A specialized use comes in historical writings, predominantly in Livy, and therefore in translations of Livy, as, in 1600 by Philemon Holland (Roman Historie 467D):

At Rome, by vertue of the authoritie of the Senatours, M[arcius] Junius was created Dictatour, and T. Sempronius [Publius Septronius Tuditanus] Generall of the horse, who proclaimed a muster, and enrolled all the younger sort above 17 yeares old, yea and some also under that age, that yet were in their **Pretexta*, and were not come to **Toga virilis*.

Two side-notes explain the Latin terms: Pretexta: "It was the upper garment that the Romanes children used untill they were fully 16 yeares of age, embrodred with purple." And Toga virilis: "Otherwise called Pura, and ἀπόρρυφος, because it was all white, and without any purple, which they put on at 17.” Holland explains the term more fully in his Second Index:

Prætexta toga, a robe embrodered of purple, common to men and women, Ingenuitatis insigne, & ornamentum. [ . . . ] Whereby it appeareth, that it was allowed but to certain persons; and as P[aulus]s Manutius writeth, to 6 sorts.

1. The children of the Patritij, until 17 yeares age. 2. All Senators upon festival daies. Wardens at the games or plaies called Compitalitij. 4. Al magistrates, as well in the citie, as in the colonies or bourrough townes incorporate, called Municipia, and Maisters of Confraternites. 5. All priests, and among them, the Augurs. 6. They that triumph. And this differed from the rest, being wrought with gold and damask worke. (sig. [6Ev<sup>rovo</sup>])

This ancient sense of pretexts is highly relevant to a literary understanding of texts: it teaches class-distinctions, a lesson difficult for us in an age that Vice-President Henry Wallace in the middle of the Second World War hoped would be, thought should be, “the century of the common man.” “A cat may look at a king,” said Alice (Carroll ch. 8); and so it may, but if we are to understand Ancient, Medieval, and Renaissance literature we must remember that kings, dukes, earls, and patricians are, we may regret it, not best looked at from the democratic gutter.

Pretext has and had other senses, from Latin praetextum onwards, among them conspicuously “pretence.” The inhabitants of the United States have been taught to spell it pretense, confusingly as if it were a tense before any existing past tense, or perhaps a past tense used for something that lies in the future. The Anglo-Saxons were imprecise (by Classical standards) in their use of tenses; and English is still less precise than, for example, French in expressing futurity, for which a present is often used; thus “I am going to the theatre next Thursday,” for “I shall be going to the theatre . . .” An Old English poetic example of the use of the pre-tense, discussed by Bruce Mitchell (Old English Syntax § 2768), is The Ruin, lines 6-9 (Krapp and Dobbie 227):<sup>1</sup>

Eorðgrap hafað
waldendwyrhtan forwearone, geleorene, heardgripe hrusan, of hund cnea werþeoda gewitan.

---

<sup>1</sup> Throughout this paper, in quoting older texts I have not always followed editorial details. It is to be noted that none of the editions I have consulted comment on the problem of tense that disturbs the syntacticians, and the translators glide over the problem by using an auxiliary plus past participle.

[The grasp of the grave, the earth's strong grip, retains the master builders, perished, lost, until a hundred generations of manly peoples died.]

The text is difficult because of spellings. There must have been a pre-text, a Vorlage or exemplar, probably not the poet's ur-text, because it is not in his presumed dialect, and like every pre-anything, not of the date of the thing we have. The pre-text might have had **forvorene*, **gelorene*, much like in vocalic stem to scorene, gedrorene "destroyed, collapsed," in the line preceding this quotation; and gewitan shows late Old English merging of the preterite ending -on with the infinitive ending -an, the pre-text might have had gewiton. The tense is odd when retained in translation: "until a hundred generations [in the future] . . . died" for "shall have died;" a pre-tense, in other words.

Poems, literary texts in general, are not usually written by syntacticians, who may well say, the more's the pity. A modern use of a pre-tense occurs in John Keats's Isabella or, The Pot of Basil. This is not the occasion to expound the intertextuality of Keats's gruesome poem and the story as told by Boccaccio in the Decameron, nor the bibliographical problem whether he read the English translation of the Decameron in the translation or adaptation (via the French perhaps) of 1804 or 1812, nor why basil may be significant. It must suffice here to tell in a sentence or two the tale, told by Keats in "dewy rhyme," just to explain why my quotation contains a pre-tense. Isabella, a lady of Florence, and Lorenzo, a young palmer, entertained tender love for each other, but Isabella's two rich, proud brothers disapproved, and murdered Lorenzo, telling her that he had gone abroad. In a vision she saw where they had buried his corpse, with the result that she went, dug up his severed head, put it in a flower-pot, covered it and planted basil on it. Now my quotation (Garrod 224), Isabella, stanza xxvii: "So the two brothers and their murder'd man / Rode past fair Florence." But Lorenzo is not yet murdered, and he was riding with the brothers past Florence to the spot where they were to slay him, "their murder'd man" means "the man to be murdered by them." Every syntactician will argue that the past participle murder'd has no tense, unlike the verb in The Ruin: it has no tense, but is expressive of the past, not a grammarian's tense, but here a pre-tense.

My neologism pre-tense has been laboured enough. Now I wish to discuss pre-texts. I have found no English or Latin dictionary that records for **pre-text*, **prae-textum*, a sense "a text before the text is formed," nor **post-text*, **post-textum*, a word unknown to these languages; and rightly so, for **post-textuality* is silent, and so is **pre-textuality*, for when it ceases to be silent it ceases to be a pre-textuality and becomes a textuality. An example might be Paradise Lost before Milton had dictated it, as a bibliographical myth relates, to his daughters for them to turn the dictated words into textuality. Or was he talking to himself, an activity which some theorists might wish to consign to another myth, orality?

For Old English literature, pre-textuality comes in the guise of mythical, mystical, heathen orality, and some contemplating Beowulf have found confirmation of that myth in the genuine orality of the Serbs, thought by them comparable to the manner of that skilful littérateur, the thoughtful Christian poet of Beowulf. Among the many approaches to the pre-textuality of Beowulf there is one that persists. The stories within the poem, formerly known as “episodes and digressions,” may go back to something oral, perhaps less polished than the metrically strict poem. Alistair Campbell, my immediate predecessor in the Oxford professorship of Anglo-Saxon, and my strict, greatly admired, and liked tutor when I was an undergraduate, in a festschrift article for J. R. R. Tolkien, made it seem that there were technical reasons for believing that there had been a pre-text, now lost of course (Campbell 13-26). Campbell thought he had found metrical proof for the pre-textual existence of at least some of the “episodes and digressions.” He believed that Old English epic was built up from earlier lays, a theory much in vogue then, and perhaps still in vogue; and Campbell stated, “Here we have definite evidence that ancient lays, thought to have arisen in heathen times, were known in monasteries” (14). He believed in variable formulas, he related Beowulf (Fulk, Bjork, and Niles 50) line 1441b gyrede hine Beowulf (“Beowulf got himself ready”) to the superficially similar line 5 of the Old High German Hildebrandslied (Steinmeyer 1), gurtun sib iro suert ana (“girded their swords on themselves”), though, of course, Old English gyrwan “to get (oneself) ready” is not the same as OE gyrdan, Old High German gurten, “to gird (oneself).” It is unusual in Old English verse for the alliteration in a second half-line to fall on a verb, gyrede, instead of a noun, especially on a name, here Beowulf. Campbell regarded the Beowulf line one of the inherited formulas in which the rule governing alliteration was broken, but

Apart from these formulae, second half-lines of this type occur once or twice in most long poems [a footnote gives two examples], but it is an astonishingly high proportion when we find two, 1128<sup>b</sup> wunode mid Finne [“remained with Finn”], and 1137<sup>b</sup> fundode wrecca [“the hero was eager to go”], in the ninety lines of Beowulf dealing with the story of Finn, and there can be little doubt that these come from the lays which the poet is following. Another, 2980<sup>b</sup> þa gebeah cyning [“then the king fell”], occurs in the account of Ongentheow’s last battle, an obvious theme for a lay. (16-17)

Once scholars had concluded to their own satisfaction that Beowulf is an epic, once they had swallowed the theory that epics are constructed by drawing on pre-texts, known archaizingly as “lays,” it did not take long to fit such non-existing pre-texts of Beowulf with metrical details allowed to stand in the “episode” or “digression” based on just such a pre-text. I leave to statisticians whether it is significant that two occurrences of a relatively rare metrical phenomenon, a second half-line with verb followed by noun alliterating on the verb, occur within a few lines of each other in a passage that has been thought to be based on a lay. Many themes touched on in the poem might be suitable for lays, if only we had a few more such lays to substantiate that myth.

Pre-texts of Middle English are no less mythical than those of Old English texts. The literary quality, however assessed, influences the amount of published scholarly or critical work to which it has been subjected. My impression is that Sir Gowther, a saintly romance of the fifteenth century, has not been much in the eyes and minds of English medieval scholars. The standard works give an outline of the plot, thus H. L. D. Ward (419-21), Mortimer J. Donovan in a chapter on Breton Lays (in Severs I 141-2), and J. A. W. Bennett in his posthumous volume (Middle English Literature 153-4) in the Oxford History of English Literature. They say little about Sir Gowther as a poetic creation other than considering it to be popular, that is, for the common people and of the common people, but not necessarily by one of the common people. Instead they focus on its pre-textual – or do I mean intertextual? – relationship with narratives about Robert the Devil, a relationship copiously explored by Karl Breul, in his full edition (Sir Gowther) more than 120 years old. What is that relationship? Breul (45-134) covers the matter exhaustively in that part of the introduction that goes under the title Litterarhistorische untersuchung, “Literary historical investigation,” of the entire range of secular and religious legends that have a bearing on the legend of Sir Gowther, together with the legend of Robert the Devil on which Sir Gowther is based. Opposite p. 107, he has an elaborate stemma showing the distribution of this legendary material, where issuing forth from the putative ur-text U one step leads to the putative religious ur-legend L within which, like a fly in a spider’s web, R is enmeshed, Robert the Devil. There are not quite fifty landing-places, and ballet and opera have not been forgotten in this wilderness of intertextualities. At the end of the edition (198-207) there is a bibliography of 106 supposed intertextual relations of the poem, and he prints (208-41) some of this Robert the Devil material. This stemma excels in complexity most stemmas showing the relationship of manuscript and printed witnesses. We might have missed our poem, Sir Gowther, if it had not been boldly underlined, just under the putative Breton Lay to which the poet himself refers both at lines 753 near the end, and near the beginning at 25-30 (Breul 136):

Iesu Cryst, þat barne blyþe,
 Gyff hom ioy þat loues to lyþe
 Of ferlys þat befell.
 A law of Breyten long y so3ht,
 And owt þerof a tale haue bro3ht þat lufly is to tell.

[Jesu Christ, that blessed child, give joy to them that delight to hear of marvels that befell. For a long time I looked for a lay of Brittany, and out of that I have brought a tale which it is enjoyable to relate.]

In the first edition (1817), E. V. Utterson (Early Popular Poetry I 157-90), who connected Sir Gowther with stories of Robert the Devil, called it “a spirited little romance ballad;” and, comparing it with a sixteenth-century English romance of Robert the Devil, published in 1798 by I[saac] Herbert,<sup>2</sup> he praised it further without considering its poetic art – if any: “The ballad before us however is not only much more valuable from its greater antiquity, but the compression of the story renders it less wearisome, and it is also more curious from the introduction of the incident producing the hero’s birth.” The long account of tail-rhyme romances by A. McInytre Trounce (III 38-40) does not appraise this poem as literature. Breul (44) himself, in his Würdigung (“appreciation”) says of Sir Gowther.<sup>3</sup> “If we consider our romance without regard merely to this relationship [the relationship to the wide range of legendary material], we have to pass this judgement on it, that it is distinguished above the many products of the same kind by the interesting material worked into it, that, however, the poet in his poetic ability by no means rises above his contemporaries.” To those old-fashioned enough to attach importance to what used to be considered the value of a poetic text as literature, this will seem not just faint praise, but condemnation expressed by comparing the poet’s ability with that of his contemporaries, and finding it wanting. To those who raise intertextuality above mere textuality Breul’s appraisal may be regarded as having raised Sir Gowther above the idle notions of literary value-judgements. Be that as it may, it justifies the amount of space accorded to the analogues in his edition, an edition which started life as a Berlin doctoral dissertation of the 1880s, a time of German academic excellence. Maldwyn Mills (xviii-xix), does not stoop to idle praise or censure, and he is good at placing the text in what he calls “the no-man’s-land that lies between the edifying romance and the saint’s life.”

<sup>2</sup> Robin Flower, “Roberte the Deuyll,” identified the editor as probably Isaac Herbert, and the manuscript as, now, British Library MS Egerton 3132.

<sup>3</sup> “[B]etrachten wir sie [unsere romanze] aber ohne rücksicht auf diese beziehung, an sich, so müssen wir das urteil über sie fällen, dass sie sich vor vielen produkten gleicher art auszeichnet durch den interessanten in ihr verarbeiteten stoff, dass aber der dichter in seinem poetischen können sich keineswegs über seine zeitgenossen erhebt.”

Robert the Devil is not mentioned in Sir Gowther, which is a simple tale of demonic birth, violent youth, a terrorist expiated through penance. If we may consider the poem, in a way somewhat reminiscent of the New Criticism, as a Ding an sich, cut free from its burdensome intertextuality, the food of doctoral study; it is a saint’s life rather than the Breton lay, law of Breyten (lines 28 and 753), that it purports to be. In fact, the version in British Library MS Royal 17 B. 43 ends (as Breul tells us [165]) with the words Explicit Vita Sancti. It is to be classed with the Oedipal legend of Pope Gregory, Gregoriuslegende, which still had post-textual life in it as late as the twentieth century when Thomas Mann (in Der Erwählte) took it in hand, via Hartmann von Aue’s Gregorius (Mertens, Hartmann), but of course not via the Middle English version (Keller, Mittelenglische Gregoriuslegende).

Hartmann von Aue’s poem is a major work by a major poet. He gives his name in an envoy, in which he invites his readers to pray for him in the hope that Gregorius, the holy sinner, may be his advocate to find divine mercy. Before the envoy, the poem proper ends in six lines of which the last four share in a single rhyme, strikingly so in a poem in couplets:

dâ sol der sündige man ein sælic bilde nemen an,
swie vil er gesündet hât,
daz sîn doch wirt guot rât
ob er die riuwe begât
und rehte buoze bestât. (3983-8)

[Thus the sinful man shall take from this a salutary example, however much he has sinned, that good help shall be his if he repents and undertakes true penance.]

In Ernst Schwarz’s edition of Hartmann’s poem a Nacherzählung by the editor follows the text, a Modern German post-narration, not a translation, an abridgement in prose, a retelling in brief form: English has no word that fully represents the German term Nacherzählung which allows the reader to feel that the retelling is a recreation, which it is not. Far from it: the poetry has evaporated, and with it much of the difficult subtlety of the poet’s art. Thomas Mann’s post-narration, Nacherzählung, errs in the opposite direction. His Der Erwählte is an amplification, he calls it a Roman “a novel.” It invites admiration for his skill with technicalities, conceptual and lexical, perhaps – dare one say it? – inviting an overwhelming by longueur, such as those may feel who, having read Buddenbrooks and Zauberberg, and one or more of his Novellen, embark on Joseph und seine Brüder, and sink rather than swim in the volumes of that amplification of some chapters of Genesis.

Thomas Mann gets some of Hartmann von Aue's poem right in modern prose. At the beginning of the long book he recaptures the miracle (Hartmann line 3757) of how the great bell of old St Peter's rings out, as it still does in the Renaissance church, to the cry of Habetis Papam; but for St Gregory, behold, no hands pull the bell-ropes at his sacred election; for three days the bells ring miraculously, even before Gregory has arrived in Rome, and according to Ulrich Mölk (46-7) this is an early account of the bell miracle. In the middle of the amplification Mann's medical training and interest in such matters leads him to dilate (234-6) on how Mother Earth, our magna parens, miraculously nurses Gregorius in his penitence, as a mother breastfeeds her new-born child. We may compare that with the seventeen years which in Hartmann's poem the penitent Gregorius was sustained (lines 3122-36); for with God nothing is impossible.

As we have seen, those who have written on Sir Gowther have come short of a full and generous appreciation of that poem. There is even less on the Middle English Pope Gregory, which sometimes goes under the name of Saint Gregory; indeed the poet calls his hero (line V 339) Seint Gregori at his birth. Its intertextual Vie de Saint Grégoire now usually goes under the name of Vie du Pape Grégoire. It appears from the information given by H. B. Sol in his great modern edition (Pape Grégoire) that none of the manuscript titles refers to Le Pape Grégoire, though the point of the poem is that the penitent, holy sinner becomes pope. Victor Luzarche, the first editor, 1857, in his enthusiasm for the French poem, identified Grégoire, the doubly incestuous sinner, with Pope Gregory the First, an identification based on nothing, and formed in spite of the ready availability of three lives of Gregory the First in the standard Maurist edition of his works in 1705, tracing his patrician origins and Christian commitment (Sancti Gregorii opera IV/1).

Early in the critical history of the Middle English poem, Sir Walter Scott (V 109), in his account of the Auchinleck MS, characterized The Legend of Pope Gregory as a “story more horrible than that of Oedipus. He is the offspring of an incestuous connexion betwixt a brother and a sister; and is afterwards unwittingly married to his own mother.” One would hardly expect Scott to share in the joyous celebration of all Rome that by his penance so great a sinner was worthy to be elected Pope. The poem is an extravagant saint's life. Its pre-text, the remarkably similar vita of St Metro of Verona, though he did not achieve election to the papacy, is discussed by Ulrich Mölk (45-8), whose account seems to imply that St Metro is well known to historians of medieval Italy. His bones were stolen in January 962 from the now demolished church of St Vitalis in Verona (Manitius II 43).

In both Sir Gowther and Pope Gregory there are features not to the taste of the last two centuries. As a demonic infant, provided with three, then six more, gentlewomen to be his wet-nurses, young Gowther sucked them so roughly that they died (lines 109-20) in the first year of his life. His violence combined with his size make him the terror of the land. Gowther's love of hunting and, more particularly, his anti-clericalism and anti-fraternalism might have endeared him to some modern critics, but, after inheriting the dukedom, he overdoes it:

Now is he duke of greyt renown,
And men of holy Kyrke dyngges down
    Where he myȝt hom mete.
Masse ne matens wold he non here,
Nor no prechygng of no frere,
    Pat dar I heylly hette.
[. . .]
Hontyng lufde he alder best,
In parke, wodd, and wylde forest,
    Bothe be weyes and strete.
He went to honte apon a day,
He see a nonry by þe way,
    And þeder con he ryde.
Tho pryorys and hur covent
With prosescion ageyn hym went
    Full hastely þat tyde
Þei wer full ferd of his body,
For he and is men boþe leyn hom by,
    Þo sothe why schuld y hyde?
And syþyn he spard hom in hor kyrke,
And brend hom up. Þus con he werke:
    Þen went his name full wyde.
[. . .]
Meydys maryages wolde he spyll,
And take wyffes agayen hor wyll,
    And sley hor husbondes too,
And make freres to leype at kragges
And parsons for to heng on knagges
    And oder prestys sloo.
To bren armettys was is dyssyre,
A powre wedow to seyt on fyre
    And werke hom mykyll woo. (169-204)

[Now he is duke of mighty fame, and he knocks down men of Holy Church wherever he could find them. He would hear neither mass nor matins, nor the preaching of any friar, I dare promise you that solemnly. [ . . . ] He loved hunting best of all, in enclosures, woods, and wild forests, both along paths and highroads. One day he went hunting, he saw a nunnery by the wayside, and he rode there. The prioress and her convent at once went in procession to meet him hastily. They were frightened of his person, for he and his men too had raped them – why should I conceal the truth? And then he locked them up in their church, and incinerated them, that is what he did. His name then went far and wide [ . . . ] He would destroy the marriages of virgins, and rape wives against their will, and furthermore slay their husbands, and make friars leap down from crags, and hang up parish priests on hooks, and kill other clergymen too. He longed to burn up hermits, to set fire to a poor widow, and to cause them great misery.]

An earl told Gowther that he was never of Christian progeny, but some fiend's son (line 209), and Gowther, after threatening him if he had told him a lie, rode to see his mother to confirm what the earl had told him, vowing to pierce her with his falchion unless she told him the truth:

“Son, syþon y schall þe soþe say,
In owe orcharde apon a day
A fende gat þe þare
As lyk my lorde as he myȝt be,
Underneyth a cheston tre.”
þen weppyd þei boþe full sare.
“Go schryfe þe, moder, and do þy best,
For y wyll to Rome, or þat y rest,
To lerne anoder lare.” (229-36)

[“Son, since I must speak the truth, one day in our orchard under a chestnut tree a fiend, as like to my lord and husband as could be, begot you there.” Then both of them wept grievously. “Go, mother, confess, and do what is best, for I will go to Rome to learn another way of behaving, rather than that I should stay here.”]

Gowther's self-imposed penance was severe. He inflicted silence on himself, ate no appetizing food, but shared the bones from the dog's mouth. After expiation he does well in chivalric battles against Saracenic enemies, including the emperor's. There is in the story a strong love element, introduced by a miracle: the emperor's daughter, having fallen from a tower, is brought back to life, from heaven back to earth, her muteness is healed, and she is able to transmit to Gowther a message of divine grace:

Ho seyd: "My Lord of heyoun gretys þe well,
And forgyffes þe þi syn yche a dell,
    And grantes þe þe blys,
And byddes þe speyke on hardely,
Eyte and drynke and make mery:
    Þou schallt be won of his."
Scho seyd to hur fader: "Þis is he þat faȝt for you deys thre
    In strong batell ywys."
Þe pope had schryuon Syr Gother:
He louyd God and Mare þer,
    And radly hym con kys,
And seyd: "Now art þou Goddes chyld;
Þe þar not dowt þe warlocke wylde
    Þer waryd mot he bee." (661-74)

[She said, "My Lord of heaven salutes you gladly, and forgives you your sins one and all, and grants you bliss, and bids you to speak right on boldly, to eat and to drink, and to be of good cheer: you shall be one of his (chosen)." To her father she said, "This is he who fought for you for three days in fierce battle, truly." The pope had shriven Sir Gowther; and he loved God and Mary then, and she [the emperor's daughter] readily kissed him, saying, "Now you are God's child; there is no cause for you to fear the wild demon; may he be cursed there."]

It is satisfactory within the story that Gowther is now God's child, no longer the demon's, the warlock's child. There is more to that resolution, that closure in fashionable jargon. It rises above secular romance, for it is a tale of sin, of penance, and of Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, in the words of Bunyan's title for a very different religious text.

Sir Gowther, in its narrative line, is not unlike Pope Gregory: double incest worst of sins, expiation, and grace abounding, leading in the end to Saint Gregory's papacy. There is hope for all sinners. No pre-text, no intertextuality helps us to understand these texts aright, though the analogues may by their similar story-line likewise purvey hope to the penitent.

I doubt if such holy teaching was and is much to the liking of Romantic and post-Romantic critics. I quote Hazlitt's praise of Chaucer's descriptions as an example of misguided praise. He compares Chaucer's with Spenser's descriptions in which he says he has found "a deal of terrible beauty" (English Poets 53; gusto probably means "style of execution"):

Chaucer's descriptions of natural scenery possess the same sort of characteristic excellence [as Spenser's], or what might be termed gusto. They have a local truth and freshness, which gives the very feeling of the air, the coolness or moisture of the ground. Inanimate objects are thus made to have a fellow-feeling in the interest of the story; and render back the sentiment of the speaker's mind.

Sir Gowther and Pope Gregory have no descriptions comparable with Spenser's. Gowther's mother was impregnated by the demon in an orchard (line 67), and when she reveals to Gowther who his father was, and where he was conceived, he is told that it was under a chestnut tree (line 233): but that setting has nothing of "a local truth and freshness." Gowther's falchion, mentioned several times in the poem, is not at all "made to have a fellow-feeling in the interest of the story, and render back the sentiment of the speaker's mind." The castle and all its towers near the beginning of Pope Gregory (line V 60) are merely the setting for the incestuous conception of Gregory, and the incestuous love between him and his sister is shown (lines V 97-8) by their sharing one knife at mealtime, drinking from one cup, (line V 109-10), sharing one bedroom, and the bed of each not far from the other. The expanse of water (brumme, line V 359) is what, without "local truth and freshness," the infant is exposed on. It would be easy to show by further examples how things are mere tools in the interest of the story, sometimes wholly or slightly symbolic. No wonder then that loyal critics of Middle English verse texts have broken no lances with detractors of Sir Gowther, and that the English Pope Gregory has met with all but universal neglect, neglect even when incest in medieval story is pursued learnedly, as it is by Elizabeth Archibald.<sup>4</sup> Whenever textuality meets with silence, pre-textuality and intertextuality may be observed to flourish. They have engaged the energies of doctoral students and academics from the 1880s onwards.

In character the légende française of La Vie du Pape Grégoire is a tale of wonder leading from sin to penance to divine grace; and similarly Sir Gowther invites wonder, never mind Robert the Devil, never mind Breton lays and romances. The greater the sins, the harsher the penance, the more glorious is God's grace. Both Sir Gowther and the versions of Gregorius, full of faith, are religious, neither is historical truth. Did they believe either story in the Middle Ages? All story exists to be believed. Medievalists need not believe what they believed, but must believe that they believed, and that what lacks historical truth may be rich in spiritual and moral truth, even for us, worldly readers of the twenty-first century not much given to pious thoughts. Religious thought is in many medieval secular works not an irrelevant intrusion. It shapes the work. It shapes Beowulf from first mention of Beowulf the Dane (not Beowulf the Geat), lines 16b-17 (Fulk, Bjork, and Niles 3): “Him þas Liffrea, / wuldres Weal-dend, woroldare forgeaf,” in Seamus Heaney’s translation (3), “[S]o the Lord of Life, / the glorious Almighty, made this man renowned.” Near the end of the poem, the imperfectly transmitted account of the lament sung by the Geatish woman for Beowulf the Geat may be of heaven (Heaney 98):

<sup>4</sup> Archibald does not so much as mention even in her bibliography the Middle English version of the legend edited by Keller, though she provides details (124-5, 194) of the legend in the English version of the Gesta Romanorum. The reason for this silence may lie in the fact that the Middle English version rests entirely on its Old French pre-text.

A Geat woman too sang out in grief;
with hair bound up, she unburdened herself of her worst fears, a wild litany of nightmare and lament: her nation invaded, enemies on the rampage, bodies in piles, slavery and abasement. Heaven swallowed the smoke.

“Heaven swallowed the smoke,” Heofon rece swealg (line 3155), clearly transmitted except for the  of swealg, but there is no knowing if this heofon is religious or secular, just the sky.

As at the beginning of April people are called to go on pilgrimage, so we are called to read The Canterbury Tales right to the end, grappling with “The Parson’s Tale” and on to the “Retraction.” In this post-Christian age we may strive to understand the devout literature of the Christian Middle Ages. Listen! The church bells ring out. Look, no hands!

References

Archibald, Elizabeth. Incest and the Medieval Imagination. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2001.

Bartsch, Karl and Adolf Harnig, eds. La langue et la Littérature française depuis le IXème siècle jusqu'au XIVème siècle. Paris: Maisonneuve et C. Leclerc, 1887, cols 83-100.

Bennett, J. A. W. ed., completed by Douglas Gray. Middle English Literature. The Oxford History of English Literature, I/2. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1986.

Breul, Karl, ed. Sir Gowther . . . nebst einer litterarhistorischen untersuchung über ihre quelle sowie den gesamten ihr verwandten sagen- und legenden-kreis mit grundlegung der sage von Robert dem Teufel. Oppeln: Eugen Franck (Georg Maske), 1886.

Bunyan, John. Grace Abounding to the chief of Sinners. London: George Larkin, 1666.

Campbell, Alistair. "The Old English Epic Style." Norman Davis and C. L. Wrenn, eds. English and Medieval Studies Presented to J. R. R. Tolkien on the Occasion of his Seventieth Birthday. London: George Allen and Unwin, 1962. 13-26.

Carroll, Lewis. Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. 1865. The Complete Works of Lewis Carroll. London: The Nonesuch Press; New York: Random House, 1959.

Flower, Robin. "The Manuscript of the Poem of Roberte the Deuyll." British Museum Quarterly, 9 (1934), 34-8.

Fulk, Robert D., Robert E. Bjork and John D. Niles, eds. Klaeber's Beowulf and the Fight at Finnsburg. Toronto, Buffalo, London: Toronto University Press, 2008.

Garrod, Heathcote W., ed. The Poetical Works of John Keats. 2nd edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1958.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von. Faust. Eine Tragödie. Goethe's Werke. Vollständige Ausgabe letzter Hand XII. Stuttgart and Tübingen: J. G. Cotta'sche Buchhandlung, 1828.

Gregorii [Sancti] Papæ I. cognomento Magni, opera omnia. 4 vols. Paris: Claudius Rigaud, 1705.

Hazlitt, William. Lectures on the English Poets. London: Taylor and Hessey, 1818.

Heaney, Seamus, trans. Beowulf. London: Faber and Faber, 1999.

Herbert, Isaac, ed. Roberte the Deuyll, a metrical romance from an ancient illuminated manuscript. London: 1798.

Holland, Philemon, trans. The Roman Historie Written by T. Livius of Padua. London: Adam Islip, 1600.

Keller, Carl, ed. Die mittelenglische Gregoriuslegende. Alt- und mittelenglische Texte 6. Heidelberg: Carl Winter, 1914.

Krapp, George Philip and Elliott Van Kirk Dobbie, eds. The Exeter Book. The Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records III. New York: Columbia University Press, 1936.

Luzarche, Victo, ed. Vie du Pape Grégoire le Grand, Légende française. Tours: J. Bouserez, 1857.

Manitius, Max. Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters. Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft. 3 vols. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1911-1931.

Mann, Thomas. Der Erwählte C Roman. Frankfurt am Main: S. Fischer, 1951.

Mertens, Volker, ed. and trans. Hartmann von Aue: Gregorius, Der Arme Heinrich, Iwein. Bibliothek des Mittelalters 6. Frankfurt am Main: Deutscher Klassiker Verlag, 2004.

Mills, Maldwyn, ed. Six Middle English Romances. Everyman's Library. London: J. M. Dent and Sons, 1973, re-issued 1992.

Mitchell, Bruce. Old English Syntax. 2 vols. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1985.

Mölk, Ulrich. Zur Vorgeschichte der Gregoriuslegende: Vita und Kult des hl. Metro von Verona. Nachrichten der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Göttingen, I, Philologische-Historische Klasse 4 (1987): 31-54.

Schwarz, Ernst, ed. Hartmann von Aue: Gregorius, Der arme Heinrich. Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1967.

Scott, Sir Walter. The Poetical Works. 12 vols. Edinburgh: Robert Cadell and Whittaker and Co, 1833-1844.

Severs, J. Burke, gen. ed. A Manual of the Writings in Middle English, I. New Haven, Connecticut: The Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1967.

Sol, Hendrik Bastiaan, ed. La Vie du Pape Grégoire, huit versions françaises médiévales de la légende du bon pécheur. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1977.

Steinmeyer, Elias von, ed. Die kleineren althochdeutschen Sprachdenkmäler. Berlin: Weidmannsche Buchhandlung, 1916.

Trounce, A. McIntyre. "Middle English Tail-Rhyme Romances." Medium Ævum, I (1932), 87-108, 168-82; II (1933), 34B57, 189-98; III (1934), 30-50.

Utterson, Edward V., ed. Early Popular Poetry. 2 vols. London: Longman, Hurst, Rees, Orme, and Brown, 1817.

Walde, Alois and Johann Baptist Hofmann, eds. Lateinisches etymologisches Wörterbuch, 3 vols. 3rd edition. Heidelberg: Carl Winter, 1954-1956.

Ward, Harry L. D., ed. British Museum Catalogue of Romances in the Department of Manuscripts, I. London: British Museum, 1883.