TWO ANNIVERSARIES.

Few will remember the two catastrophes which occurred on the 7th and 11th of January 70 years ago, which plunged the mountain village Bedretto, near Airole, and the town of Locarno, into deep mourning. Early in the year 1863, exceedingly heavy snow falls were witnessed, and the mountain passes were closed to any postal traffic for a longer period than usual. When, in the spring the snow started to melt, the danger of avalanches throughout the Bedretto Valley became imminent, and on January the 7th, shortly after noon, a mighty avalanche surprised the small village. In a few minutes, all the houses, with the exception of two, were buried beneath a tremendous mass of snow. 31 of the inhabitants lost their lives, and the survivors everything they possessed.

Four days later, during a service in the Antonios church at Locarno, the roof collapsed, owing to the great weight of snow, which had accumulated, and 46 members of the congregation perished, and many were seriously injured.
