the air, and whilst we are still in astonishment about this shining light the rain falls heavily like a shower bath accompanied by thunder and lightening as if never to end, though it is over again in a very short time.

Another phenomenon can be viewed from a similar spot! Sitting in the golden sunshine and dreaming with open eyes, we suddenly notice that the next mountain-top is enveloped in a veil. This is the first sign of the approaching fog, but not a fog to be compared with our peppery London fog. It is rather like mist clouded together, and soon big heavy drops fall on the leaves of the This is the first sign of the approaching fog, but not a fog to be compared with our peppery London fog. It is rather like mist clouded together, and soon big heavy drops fall on the leaves of the trees. They seem like tears rolling heavily on the ground. Whilst following the way of these first few raindrops, a bird crosses quickly and becoming aware of the hidden agitation in the trees and in the air, we hear also the alluring calls of the birds all round. All the insects who only a short while ago had been walking busily over the grass in the sunshine have now disappeared. Then suddenly the thunder rolls through the air with the lightening showing the way and the surrounding mountains seem to be one with the now falling rain. Nothing is discernible, we seem to be enwrapped in a heavy curtain, which however, is not oppressive. Look round! The sun is lifting here and there a corner of this curtain, and the sunbeams search their way through like groping hands. The dense fog disappears, like white mist it remains hanging on the mountains and gradually we get again a wide, free, sunny look over the whole surroundings, but no, it was a mistake. The beauty of the moment is gone again and the mist is descending with open arms, grasping the sun-beams eagerly, swallowing them up. Suddenly dark columns of fog stand up from the lake and seem to guide the mist now gliding over the lake like a grey shadow behind which the columns fall, leaving to the eyes a most beautiful sight of the clear mountains with the small villages. After this the weather seems better than ever, in the clean air is a wonderful fragrance from all the flowers and herbs mixed with the strong odour of the wet earth.

The next morning we find the mountains free-int hemselves from the soft white down-covers, awakened by the first kiss of the early morning the mountains seem to wear white scarfs — it is the morning mist. Soon the sun is lifting them away, reigning alone all over the place, showing the rich green of the woods and the beautiful colouring o

Nordstern travel to Bern and knock F. C. Bern from 4th in the table down to seventh.

On the 30th, the tit-bit is Young Boys win over Grasshoppers, which has now lifted them above Concordia in the table, on goal-average, I always thought they would get out of the mire sooner or later, but they left it a bit late this time. Of course, they are not safe yet, but are well on the way. Young Fellows booked another success and are now fifth. Basel found the grapes in the Ticino to be rather sour and Servette once more go to the top of the table with 20 points, same as Lausanne, but one game in hand.
