Speaking for Switzerland at the Havana trade conference, Dr. Stucki said Switzerland would be unable to join the International Trade Organization if the trade charter was kept in its present form. The present charter would be a "catastrophe" for Switzerland. As a hard currency country without exchange controls and without balance-of-payment difficulties she was in a peculiar position. This should be recognized by giving her the same right to use import restrictions when needed as were already provided for countries like Britain in balance-of-payment difficulties.

Dr. Stucki said that with such protection Switzerland could continue a trade policy that was liberal but was based on a quid pro quo and that had enabled her to maintain her economy on a relatively high level. He introduced an amendment embodying his idea. Some of the European countries agreed that Switzerland's was a special case and a working group was set to studying it.

Mr. Arthur Woodburn, Secretary of State for Scotland, in a letter to the Swiss Minister in London, thanks him for the kindness shown by Swiss families who acted as hosts to 200 delicate Scottish children on a three months holiday in Switzerland organised by the Swiss Red Cross.

"Reports which I have received from those who have been concerned in the scheme in this country, and who have seen the children before their departure and on their return," the letter says, "make it abundantly clear that the visit to Switzerland was a most happy experience for the children and that it has been of great benefit to them in many ways. The kindness and care which had been bestowed upon them by their Swiss hosts were evidenced not only by the manifest improvement in their health and by their wish to return to Switzerland at the earliest opportunity but also by the generous gifts which they brought back with them. I am profoundly grateful to the Swiss families which have done so much for those children."

It now seems that the wolf which was shot near Eichholz in the middle of December could not have been the much hunted "Beast of the Valais." Geneva scientists who examined the animal found that it was only about 18 months old, and was therefore born after the mysterious killing of sheep and calves had begun in the Valais. This is the first time that a wolf has been shot in Switzerland since 1821.

It is still supposed that the "Beast" was a wolf — or perhaps a pair of wolves, and it is pointed out that only recently, in the forest of Finges, a peasant put to flight two animals which looked like wolves. Gamekeepers are again on the watch, but the new beat that has been ordered is not expected to yield any result until the low country is sufficiently covered with snow.
