Economics

The "Financial Times" in their issue of the 12th, of June, 1948, writes the following about the "Swiss Industrial Outlook":

"Most of the main Swiss industrial companies have now published their reports for 1947. The chief fact that emerges is that satisfactory profits have only been achieved by increased outputs to offset rising costs.

Generally the accounts show a much more satisfactory situation than that described in the managers' reports. This is due largely to the fact that statistics refer to the past and comments to the future.

With only a few exceptions net profits have been higher than those of previous years, but this was only made possible by a still higher output, in order to compensate for increasing costs.

This point has been given special consideration by all the Boards.

Whereas it was still possible for leading industries (such as chemistry, steel, machine-tools and aluminium) to step up their output and sales to a higher level during the past year, doubts have been expressed fairly generally on the prospects of continuing such increases in the future.

The position has been aggravated by exceptional circumstances which have on the one hand created and accumulated demands for Swiss products, and on the other hand have diverted to Switzerland orders that would have normally gone elsewhere.

Swiss industrialists tried to meet this demand for quantity without giving up quality and therefore had to comply with legitimate demands of workers from whom a great deal is required. But such demands are particularly important for a manufacturing industry since they add, in determining prices, a new element which varies from one country to another, but which is independent from the world market of raw materials.

Although, in most cases, industry is sure of full employment for more than two years, the prospective difficulties are serious.

The gigantic efforts of many countries to export, the currency softness of some of the usual customers, the development of European reconstruction which involves the rebuilding of competing industries and the progressive meeting of accumulated needs, are among international factors which must be taken into account.

As far as the technical and financial situation of Swiss industries is concerned, it is quite sound in comparison with that prevailing after the first World War.

This cautious policy, however, has its compensations in the stability and strength it will give to Swiss industries in adverse circumstances, though it has entailed some restriction in profits which could have been made during the boom period.
