The Swiss Federal Railways are this year celebrating their fiftieth anniversary. Here are a few figures which will help to explain the extent of this national railway system. The total length of the Federal Railway network is approximately 2,000 miles. Another 2,000 miles are operated by private companies. Only some 60 miles of the nationally owned lines are still used for steam transportation because of the geography of the country, the network includes over 3,000 railway bridges and 240 tunnels, the longest of which is the Simplon tunnel with a total length of 12 miles.

A serious crime wave which has swept Switzerland during recent months has given rise once more to the question whether the death sentence should be re-introduced into the Swiss penal code.

The matter is to be debated in Parliament shortly. The death sentence in Switzerland was repealed once before (1874), following a nation wide referendum. In the next four years a crime wave, similar to the present one, swept the country.

By another referendum it was decided to authorise cantonal governments to reintroduce the death sentence. It was not until 1938, that a new penal code covering the whole of Switzerland was finally approved, and abolished capital punishment.
