The Swiss electorate voted last month on the new articles that the Government proposed to add to the constitution. The first — accepted by 670,747 votes to 158,333 — enables the Federal Government to take the necessary measures against water pollution, which has dangerously increased in lakes and rivers.

The Swiss are the only European people who are called upon to vote on financial questions, and who can decide on the amount of taxes they are willing to pay.

Last month, for the second time in 18 months, they rejected — this time by 487,364 votes to 353,962 — the scheme submitted to them for supplying the Federal Government with the financial means it needs.
