The Swiss Government has informed Parliament that membership of the Neutral Nations Commissions in Korea had so far cost the country 5,500,000 francs

(about £458,000) and the belligerents did not intend to pay back any of it.

In a 100-page report on Korea, the Government said: "There is no doubt that the mission offered to us in Korea gave us the opportunity to prove that neutrality can still serve the cause of peace through co-operation in peaceful international tasks, even though they may be thankless, difficult, and fraught with risks".

Details have been issued in Berne of a revised Bill giving the Federal Government exceptional powers for the economic defence of the country in the event of war being imminent. It displaces earlier drafts — that of 1952 which was criticized as too authoritarian and centralizing, and that of 1954 which was condemned as too timorous.

The new draft has 41 articles, and is accompanied by an explanatory message running to 64 pages. It starts from the premise that a nation's capacity to resist aggression depends not only on its armed forces but also on its economic resources. Among other things, it empowers the Government to build up stocks, to control prices, and to regulate exports and imports. The Government points out that in the three years during which the Bill has been in preparation, armistices were concluded in Korea and Indo-China, but adds that prospects of a lasting peace have hardly improved this year.

The cold war, with its unpredictable alternations of tension and brief relaxation, was subjecting the nation to a hard test. "Fear," the Government says, "gives way to apathy, and vice versa". It is therefore more than ever necessary that purposefulness and perspicacity should be the guiding qualities of governmental policy."

The Swiss Government has launched an intensive campaign to stop men joining the French Foreign Legion, whose Swiss strength numbers between 1,000 and 2,000.

Some 200 men leave Switzerland every year to enrol at the Legion's grim barracks in Marseilles. Thus the Swiss Citizen-Army is deprived of roughly two battalions of troops.

Only partial success has resulted from Swiss efforts to get France to help limit the enrolment of Swiss legionnaires, particularly miners.

Le Vagabond de Londres

PELE-MELE TOURISTIQUE, SPORTIF ET LITTERAIRE . . .

Paris au printemps est la plus douce, la plus charmante et la plus coquette des capitales. Les premiers beaux jours revenus donnent à cette ville de rêve des couleurs qui inspireraient le plus médiocre des peintres du dimanche. Des Champs-Elysées à la Place St. Michel, de Pigalle et de sa rue qui monte vers le plaisir au Palais-Royal de Mme Colette et de Cocteau, Paris, avec ses quartiers riches par leur diversité et leur physionomie éblouissante, demeure la reine et la plus désirable des capitales. Capitale de l'esprit, des belles lettres, de tous les arts ; capitale de la bonne vie, de la gastronomie la plus raffinée, de la dive bouteille ; capitale de la volupté, de toutes les voluptés, du coût de la vie le plus élevé après New-York. On aime Paris. On ne peut éprouver que des sentiments pour Londres. Remarque qui ne m'est pas personnelle : elle est de M. Cyril Connolly.

L'esprit de Paris, bien différent de l'humour londonien, s'étale publiquement ici et là. On le cueille comme une belle fleur, et certains mêmes le glissent à leur boutonnière à la manière d'un oeillet d'Oscar Wilde. Il est possible d'établir une comparaison, même un rapprochement, entre un Fernandel et un Norman Wisdom. Mais l'esprit de Paris est, lui, incomparable. Dans ces petits théâtres que l'on appelle les chansonniers, et qui grimpent eux aussi comme la rue Pigalle vers la Butte Montmartre, les professionnels de l'esprit font oublier chaque soir à un public venu pour cela les monotones réalités de la vie quotidienne. Robert Rocca, en voyant dans le film "Du rififi chez les hommes" quatre bandits occupés à perforez le plafond d'une banque, a eu ce mot : "Au fond, dans le gangstérisme, c'est comme dans les autres métiers, le tout c'est d'arriver à percer !" Les jeunes fantaisistes Poiret et Serrault ont, par ailleurs, constaté judicieusement : "Les incendies éclatent la plupart du temps parce qu'il n'y a pas de cendriers dans les endroits où il est interdit de fumer".

L'art de la gueule trouve dans Paris une consécration de chaque instant. On souhaite, poliment mais fermement, que les restaurateurs de Londres et d'Angleterre passent la Manche cet été pour aller parfaire sur les routes de France et de Navarre leur éducation culinaire. A la "Rôtisserie de la reine Pédaue", place St. Lazare, le moins gourmand et le plus spartiate des sujets de Sa Majesté divaguera après le fabuleux menu bourguignon — et rabelaisien — qui est servi dans la salle Anatole France. Et puis, la bonne cuisine peut aller de pair avec la distraction frivole. Au haut de la rue Lepic, où Henri Bordeaux situa l'un de ses romans, le restaurant "Belles et Buttes" offre non seulement un échantillon de bonne cuisine, mais encore un exemple de bonne fantaisie. Et dans une petite salle aménagée de façon très particulière, les dames, pour aller s'asseoir sur la banquette, doivent passer par-dessus les tables. Sous les regards très intéressés des hommes. Et alors qu'un guitariste chante en jouant des chansons grivoises comme au bon vieux temps du roi Henri.
