Pestalozzi Children's Village Ten Years Old.

Recently, a village with a total of 18 houses and 450 inhabitants celebrated its ten-year existence which, by itself, would be nothing extraordinary when one considers the more than thousand-year-old history of so many other Swiss places. However, the neat little colony standing on the fringe of the respectable parish of Trogen in the Appenzell countryside of Eastern Switzerland represents an experiment which has turned out happily and which has become known throughout the world as the Pestalozzi Children's Village. More than 200 of the 450 young inhabitants enjoy the rights of a naturalised person, there being 72 orphans, 78 half-orphans and 54 social orphans from Great Britain, France, Italy, Austria, Finland, Germany, Greece and Switzerland. Including local residents only staying for a short period, ten nations are represented to-day in the village named after the great Swiss educationalist, Heinrich Pestalozzi. In addition, more than a thousand youngsters spent their summer holidays here, being accommodated in a village guest house called the "Cocinella", which had been especially constructed for them. Year after year many "Old Boys", who in the meantime have turned the education they received in the Children's Village to profitable account either in professional life or as university students, return thankfully to the scene of their happy youth for a short while. On the occasion of the Jubilee celebrations, the first letter bestowing the honorary freedom of the Children's Village was presented to the Swiss author, Walter Corti, the initiator of this enterprise which, in the aftermath of the Second World War, was intended to become "a meeting place to work together and understand one another, surmounting national, religious and linguistic barriers". The scene of the village festivities was "Canada Hall", a donation from Canada. Amongst the guests of honour were the diplomatic representatives of Canada and of all those nations who have entrusted a group of children of their own country to the village.
