[A.T.S.]

Though alpine snows were less abundant than normally, the quantity remaining in autumn was much greater than usual, because the summer was not warm enough to melt them. That explains why on several glaciers the level of the higher snowfields showed a rise of about 3in. over last year.

Among the retreating glaciers the Great Aletsch, Findelen, and Zmutt glaciers receded by about 72ft., the Gorner by nearly 108ft., the Oberaar by 132ft., the Lower Grindelwald by 42ft., the Morteratsch by 93ft., the Tschierwa by 351ft. (in two years), and the Roseg by 231ft. (in two years). Those at a standstill were the Mont Fort, Lenta and Paradisino glaciers. On the other hand, the Allalin glacier moved forward by 51ft., the Bella Tola by 63ft. (in two years), the Vertsankle by 129ft. (in two years), the Lischana by 42ft., the L'En Darrey by 81ft., and the Tälliboden glacier by 51ft.

There is therefore no immediate danger of seeing the Rhône glacier extending its ice flow down to Avignon — as it did in prehistoric times. On the other hand, a certain American tourist showed an unjustified fear when, last July, after reading that the melting of the alpine snows and glaciers was in full swing, he rushed into a car sales room in Berne and asked for the fastest car available so as to be able to reach the glaciers before they had completely melted.
