An even more formidable sight than the knight in his armour would be the skinned cow which is said to have appeared for the last time before the destruction of old Berne three centuries ago. The story is that a cruel butcher who skinned a cow alive was condemned to assume the form of the poor animal. For a long time, Berners believed that it roamed the streets on holy days and in time of war, begging for mercy.

* * *

Other Berne ghost yarns centre on General Robert Scipio von Lentulus, an almost 7-foot-tall Swiss mercenary who rose high in the army of Frederick the Great. He is said to live at the edge of a wood on the outskirts of town in a solitary summerhouse.

Whenever Switzerland is in danger, people call out to the general for advice, waiting to hear him reply through the closed shutters.

But the general seems to be at a loss with the weapons and strategy of modern warfare. During the last two wars his reply was silence.
