Fribourg. The debate on a new federal law was still being pursued and a popular initiative for total freedom in this domain was in conflict with the "time limit solution" proposed by the government.

Another area where women's rights have yet to be vindicated was work. Women have now obtained a guaranteed wage while absent from work during pregnancy. But although Switzerland has endorsed the "equal pay for equal work" principle, there is still a gap between theory and practice. In public administration, women get the same pay but far lower chances for promotion. The result is that, in the public and private sectors, women are in the main paid 30 per cent less than men.

Mrs. Girardin stressed, however, that women should not only be concerned with matters concerning them specifically. They should get involved in all the major and wider issues affecting the nation. The speaker noted that women now had a chance to be heard at the highest level. She said that women MPs, benefiting from their small number in Parliament, were always listened to with great attention when they rose to speak during debates.

Referring to the institutional problems of Switzerland, Mrs. Girardin suggested that there might be an "excess of democracy" and noted that a great many women never took the trouble to vote, despite their new-won rights. She nevertheless predicted that women would in future come in greater numbers to the polls.

SO YOU THINK YOU CAN SKI!

The Scandinavian tourist industry has launched a drive to lure the Swiss away from their own ski slopes.

The Norwegian Tourist Office and SAS (Scandinavian Airlines) have announced a Christmas-to-March programme of eight-day Langlauf skiing holidays in Norway, with weekly flight departures from Zurich, Geneva and Basle.

Langlauf — cross-country skiing — is one of Europe's fastest-growing winter sports activities. It is less dangerous than downhill skiing, the equipment is less expensive, and relatively little or no instruction is needed. It is also an ideal sport for all members of the family.

Said Mr. Frank Nilsen, SAS District Manager in Geneva: "We Scandinavians can teach the Swiss nothing about downhill skiing. But when it comes to Langlauf, I think we can show them a trick or two."

"We launched the idea in France three years ago — and already this winter 2,000 Frenchmen have booked Langlauf holidays. If this success is repeated with the Swiss, the idea may be extended to other European markets as well."

Price for the eight-day arrangement is from Sw.Fr. 1,230 per person — including the return flight, full hotel board and accommodation, and the services of a qualified Norwegian ski instructor if needed.

NEW PUBLICATIONS
