unadventurous and added stingingly that the British public had missed nothing having to wait for so long for a performance of Swiss contemporary music.

The Neue Zürcher Zeitung correspondent, a German musicologist and ex-conductor, promised to write a scathing article and complain in no uncertain terms over the fact that the concert (the first of two at the Cockpit Theatre) should have been staged with Swiss taxpayer's money. It was in fact organised in collaboration with Pro-Helvetia and the cultural section of the Swiss Embassy.

Altogether 48 people attended the first performance, and a good two-thirds of them seemed to have been invited. There would therefore be grounds to question the expenses incurred by Pro-Helvetia.

Most of the audience left the experimental hall with glazed eyes and air of incredulity on their faces. One should be fair, however, and accept that all the players, in particular Miss Jeanneret, played with utter dedication. What indeed matters is that the promoters of such music are sincere and not "con-artists".

At a reception given later by Mr. René Serex, Counsellor for Political Affairs at the Embassy and acting Cultural Attaché, following the departure of Mr. Franz Birrer, it was possible to gather from Mr. Gaudibert that he really was sincere. There was no reason not to believe him. After all, there is no money to be made in that type of music and one is more likely to be exposed to the jeers of a bewildered public. Mr. Gaudibert, who is in charge of musical activities at the Cultural Centre at Orleans, is genuinely looking for something but he admits smilingly that he doesn't quite know where his search is leading him. Still, the sincerity of its protagonists is the main criteria by which to gauge music of this kind.

This music is called "musique concrète" by the French and I understand that what was heard on 19th and 20th March at the Cockpit Theatre was in line with the works of Xenakis. Gaudibert was not the only modern Swiss composer represented at this two-day festival. Others included Klaus Huber, Ulrich Gasser, Heinz Marti, Roland Moser and two "classics", Arthur Honegger and Frank Martin.
