"Vehicule Stabile" (1960) by Jean Tinguely is made of cast iron and scrap metal welded with found objects. It is powered by an electric motor.

Movement and sound at work

SWISS sculptor Jean Tinguely is well known on the Continent and in America but his show at the Tate Gallery in the autumn will be the first time that he has been shown here in depth.

Tinguely, born in 1925, went to Paris in the early Fifties where he started to make a series of abstract reliefs and constructions in wire and metal, their painted cutout shapes made to move with the aid of electric motors.

In 1960, after a visit to New York where he met Rauschenberg and Johns, his sculptures became larger, and were built of scrap metal, rusty wheels and other junk or found objects.

Movement and sound are an integral part of Tinguely's work. His functioning but useless machines have a crazy, unpredictable life of their own which can amuse, surprise or seem to threaten the spectator.

Tinguely has made sculptures which squirt water, throw balls, crush bottles or plates, make abstract paintings, emit a variety of loud noises and even destroy themselves.

Since the mid-1960s his works have tended to be monumental in scale, some of them suggestive of monsters, half animal, half machine. Their movements are often a grotesque parody of human actions. The exhibition includes 40 sculptures from all phases of Tinguely's career, with particular emphasis on the work of the early Sixties.

Pierre Degen was born in Switzerland in 1947 and began his training as jewelry designer at the Ecole d'Arts Appliqués in La Chaux-de-Fonds from 1963 to 1968. He worked and studied further in Lucerne before coming to London in 1971.

After a period at a language school, he got a job as technician and part-time lecturer at Central School of Art and Design. Since 1973 he has been a freelance jeweller and lecturer at the Jewelry Department of Middlesex Polytechnic in London.

The pieces shown at the coming exhibition at the Crafts Council's Gallery, from September 22 to October 24, are rather large and have been conceived to be worn in open spaces such as countryside, seaside, etc.

The variety of jewelry caters for specific and general occasions and the pieces just widen the choice of the already available items and occasions.

The propeller in the photo graph is made of thin plywood and worn with the aid of a harness, like a rucksack.
