EDUCATION IN SWITZERLAND

SWITZERLAND, with a population of just over six million people, supports no fewer than 10 establishments of university level. Of these, seven are universities proper, two are institutes of technology and one a university standard school of economics, business and public administration.

There are five establishments in German-speaking Switzerland and five in the French-speaking part of the country, though Fribourg University is bi-lingual. There are, however, no university level institutions in the Italian-speaking areas.

Although the universities all have a similar structure, each establishment has its own character and its own reputation. Like universities in other European countries, Swiss universities provide a specialised education which builds on the more general secondary education.

Unlike the English three term system, Swiss universities divide the academic year into two semesters; the winter semester lasts from mid-October to early March and the summer one from mid-April to mid-July.
