WILD-FLOWER TIME IN SWITZERLAND

Who does not know that sunny Switzerland is famed for its wild flowers, just as Holland is famed for the cultivation of bulbs? So naturally everyone as soon as they enter this welcome, holiday-making country of mountains, lakes, waterfalls and woods, wishes to discover for themselves some of these floral treasures that Mother Earth produces with such generosity and such apparent ease.

May and June are the two finest months of the year to behold the famous wild flowers of Switzerland in all their magnificence. These are the two months when the banks of the cool waterways in the verdant valleys, the meadows, hillsides and right up to the snow line are aglow with a myriad colours, a myriad scents. Only down in southern Switzerland, in the canton of Tessin, is almost every month a flower month.

Many people have heard much of the coveted edelweiss with its velvet-like petals and its habit of growing in dangerous places, and they know of the popular alpenrose and some of the other rarer Alpine specimens. Many of us have seen them as emblems, carved in wood and ivory, when we have never seen the real flower.

But there is a great wealth of "floral finds" among the more common varieties, which Nature enthusiasts should be as familiar with as they are with the daisy and dandelion of an English field. All these eminently beautiful and more ordinary wild flowers spread themselves out carpetwise in a wild profusion over woods, fields, river-sides and mountain slopes and on many a barren crag, decking the landscape for people's admiration. And these with discretion can be gathered.

The violet, which Britons, especially those dwelling in towns, covet so much in early spring, and often pay dearly for just to have the fragrance of their scent, abound in the woods and grassy slopes all over Switzerland. They appear in April, here sparsely, there copiously; you may find them everywhere, short-stalked and long-stalked, pale and dark, and often white and sometimes yellow, scented and otherwise. Here and there a little patch and sometimes in wonderful dense clusters as if they had been carefully planted by a horticulturist. Where we at home go looking for bluebells, here one seeks the violet.

Here and there in every district are the delicate periwinkles; one comes upon them unexpectedly in some copse, growing profusely, as if they had played truant from some neat garden! Cowslips are dotted among the fresh green grass, oxlips are even more general and the horehound abounds. Whilst the fragile white and flesh tinted wood-anemone or wind flower graces the shady copses, closing at nightfall.

And whilst one is reveling among these beautiful flowers of the valley that make such a perfect setting for the fine Alpine scenery, further up, just on the snow line, peeps the crocus, as if they had pushed away the cold snow in their desire to show their glory.

After these heralds of spring, comes the advent of summer, celebrated by a succession of many varieties. All the common ones which we are familiar with in England we see here in Switzerland also, but how much bigger they are, and how much more prolific. At the end of May and throughout June, when one might say wildflowerdom is at its zenith, all the better known commoner wildflowers are growing abundantly by the waysides. Early spring and white sweet-scented orchids, forget-me-nots, bugles, harebells, scabious, ox-eyed daisies, milchworts, rampions, globe flowers, saintfoin and rest harrow, are beautifying every meadow, every bank and every wood. They grow on longer, stronger stalks, and their flowers are often literally twice the size of those we see at home; even the daisies and the dandelions look imposing!

In addition to all these commoner varieties in the valleys, we find up in the hills and mountains the treasured sweet-scented yellow auricula, and many of the family of ranunculus and primula — perhaps the most beautiful being the delicate little pink clustered one; mountain pansies, the beloved gentians, both the trumpet and star variety, and up on the snow line the wonderful white anemones.

Such are a few of the many flowers which all visitors should look for when they come to Switzerland, remembering it is a land of varying altitudes; when it is spring in the valley it is winter in the mountains; when it is summer below, it is spring above.

Only those who have come to Switzerland and seen the splendour of all her wild flowers, and taken part in a floral treasure hunt can understand the enthusiasm to be derived from that opportunity. And to be permitted to pluck some of those specimens that are not too rare, to make a garland of them or to set them upon a table for further admiration, is the supreme thanksgiving we can offer to Sunny Switzerland.
