MAGIC & MYSTIC

 \bigcirc Like some mysterious figure emerging from the mists of a magical land, a new presence is making itself felt in the dawning design themes for the 1990s, now being presented by British designers.

The presence is essentially feminine, abundant and rooted in Nature. It is seeping into the British culture, exerting an influence on the arts and effecting the very lifestyle of the British.

The embodiment of this presence is the New Woman, a mixture of old and rich traditions and of modern, educated liberalism. She has been born out of the Green Movement and will be leading families and society towards a more caring, more in tune with Nature attitude. And, as seen in the latest designs, she is to be clothed in the same mixture of old and new, in styles that emphasise a voluptuous womanliness, whilst at the same time maintaining a modern freedom.

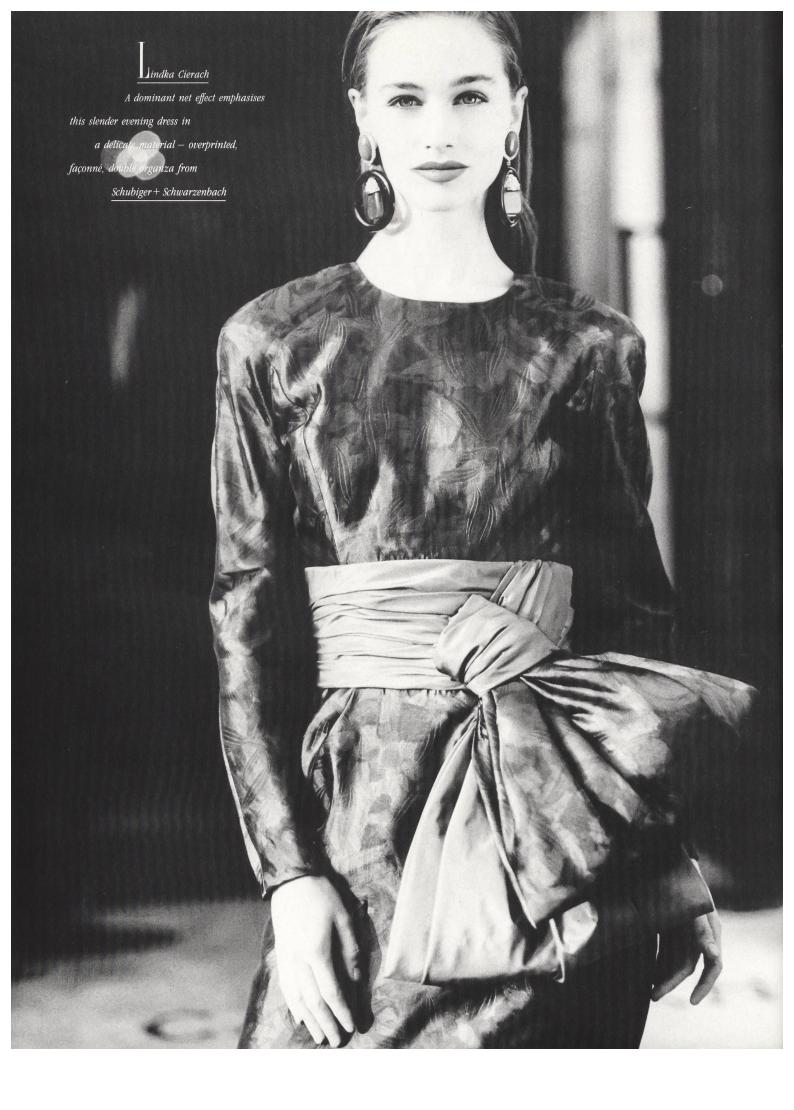

And in their choice of materials to suit the New Woman, British designers are turning away from the crisp, hard fabrics of the 1980s decade, towards all manner of lighter, more supple, more decorative and figure flattering materials that must combine quality with environmentally friendly production.

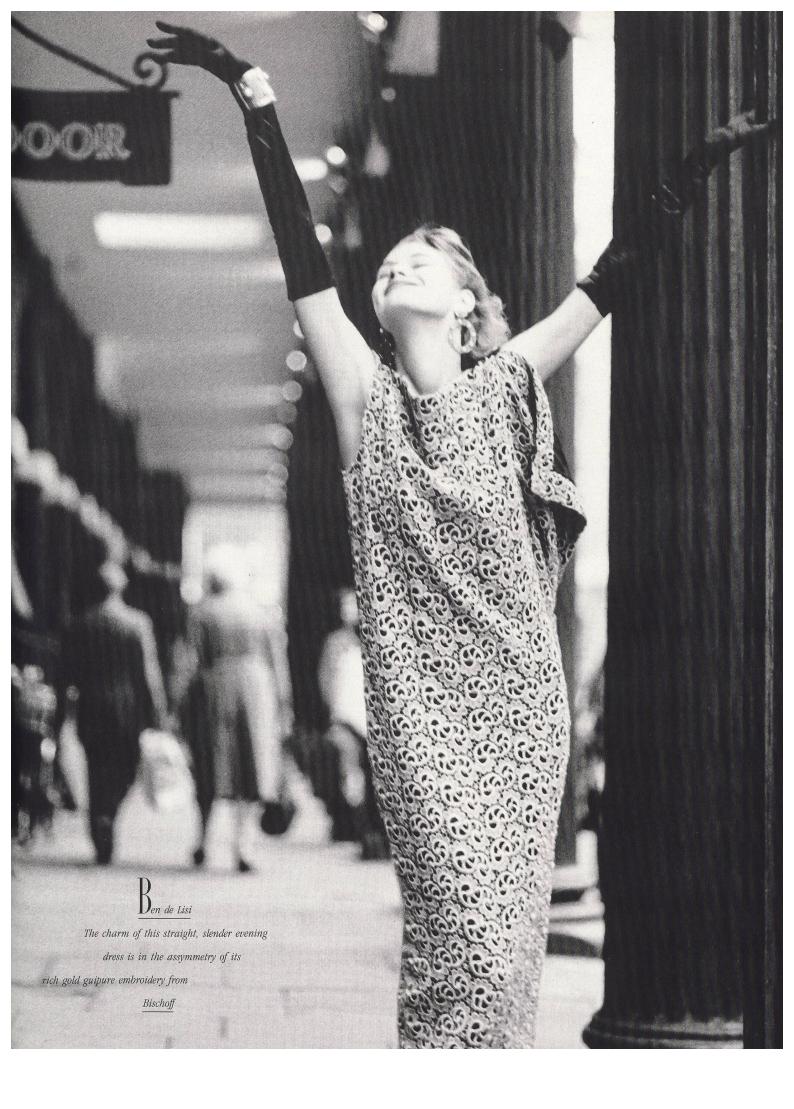

In this, Swiss textiles have strong appeal. The leading designers have long appreciated the best of Swiss materials and now many of the new, younger names are also keen to use them. From the finest lawns for the gauzy magical creations included within the ethnic and surreal sectors, through to the most ornamented and decorative of embroidered and sequinned fabrics for the more sophisticated designs, Swiss made textiles are enjoying renewed attention from British designers at all levels.

The richness of Swiss materials at their best ties in with the new mood sweeping through the London design salons. They represent a complete swing away from the "poor" and tattered rags that have clothed the trendy London young for most of the '80s. A whole new generation is slowly awaking to the realisation that beauty is more desirable than ugly. The bizarre and the shocking, the aggressive and the macho that have ruled the London street fashion scene are retreating. For the 1990s, the New Woman is going to be proud of her attributes. She is going to want to be beautiful once more, in a natural and healthy fashion — and with a little design magic.
