Schweizer Architektur von Deutschland aus gesehen

Jürgen Joedicke

Für die vielfältigen Beziehungen zwischen Schweizer Architektur und deutscher Architektur bedeutete das Jahr 1933 einen tiefgreifenden Einschnitt. Was zuvor selbstverständlich gewesen war, der geistige Austausch, wurde nun problematisch. Wie eng vor dieser Zeit die Verbindungen waren, sei an zwei Beispielen verdeutlicht. Wie viele Schweizer hatte auch Otto R. Salvisberg in Deutschland, in München, studiert und war daran anschliessend, von 1908 bis 1930, in Berlin als Architekt tätig gewesen, ehe er 1930 als Professor an die ETH berufen wurde. Ein anderes Beispiel ist der in Basel geborene Hannes Meyer, der seit 1927 als Lehrer am Bauhaus in Dessau tätig war und von 1928 an als Nachfolger von Walter Gropius das Bauhaus leitete. 1930 musste er bereits sein Amt niederlegen, die sich ankündigenden politischen Verhältnisse in Deutschland erlaubten keine Fortsetzung seiner Arbeit.

In diese Jahre fallen auch zwei Ereignisse, die für die weitere Entwicklung des Neuen Bauens von grosser Bedeutung waren: die Weissenhofsiedlung in Stuttgart (1927) und die Gründung der CIAM (1928) auf Schloss La Sarraz in der Schweiz.

Die Weissenhofsiedlung hatte deutlich gemacht, dass unter den vielfältigen Ansätzen der Moderne in unterschiedlichen Ländern Gemeinsamkeiten bestanden; sie war das Manifest einer neuen Bewegung. So schien die Zeit günstig zu sein, eine internationale Vereinigung zu schaffen, welche die isolierten Bestrebungen um ein neues Bauen oder um eine moderne Architektur zusammenfassen sollte. An der Gründungsveranstaltung in La Sarraz nahmen Architekten aus Belgien, Deutschland, Frankreich, Holland, Italien, Österreich, der Schweiz und Spanien teil. Der nächste Kongress fand bereits 1929 in Frankfurt a. M. statt, wo Ernst May seine für die zwanziger Jahre vorbildlichen Siedlungen errichtet hatte.

Mit der Geschichte der CIAM sind vor allem zwei Namen verknüpft, der in La Chaux-de-Fonds geborene Le Corbusier und der erste Historiker dieser Bewegung, der Schweizer Siegfried Giedion. Sein Buch «Space, Time and Architecture» wurde so etwas wie die Bibel der neuen Bewegung.

Das Beispiel Le Corbusiers lässt jedoch auch etwas von der Mentalität der
