At the request of the army command the publication of two Basle papers has been prohibited as their policy and contents endangered the independence and neutrality of Switzerland. One is the "Neue Basler Zeitung," edited by Dr. Rolf Henne, who received considerable monthly payments from a German publishing house; documents seized during a search at offices in Basle and Zurich furnished indisputable evidence. In the case of the "Freiheit" no trace of foreign finance has been discovered but this communist publication has excelled in glorifying the Russian aggression in Finland.

The death of Giuseppe Pagani at Torre (Blenio Valley) will be mourned in London by the older members of the Ticinese Colony. Born in 1869 he came to London while still in his teens and made himself a position in the catering and hotel trade. He was identified with the well-known restaurant in Great Portland Street bearing his name and managed in conjunction with Carlo Meschini, the father of the present proprietor, to make Pagani's the illustrious rendez-vous of the great leaders in the world of music and art. Soon after the outbreak of the last war he severed his connection with his adopted country and returned to Torre (Ticino) where he started manufacturing chocolate. In spite of the competition of the powerful combines the products of his firm, the "Cima Norma," enjoyed wide-spread popularity; he was president of the association of independent chocolate manufacturers.

A pretty story comes from Basle where some soldiers on leave conceived the idea of fixing a Xmas tree with lighted candles on a raft; they sent it down the Rhine where it is supposed to have floated merrily between the Maginot and Siegfried lines. It is not stated by what miracle the raft found its way through the pontoon bridge at Hüningen.
