SWISS WOMEN AHEAD!

1968, the year of Human Rights is over; but still Switzerland's women are fighting to obtain the same political rights and duties now reserved to the "strong" sex, a position which their sisters beyond the borders have been taken for granted for a long time. One must admit, however, that there is still little interest in politics, particularly among the older generation. Our educational system is not at least to blame for this state of matters: even nowadays, it happens frequently that girls are excluded from political instruction and sent instead to lessons in domestic science, cookery and needlework which are certainly useful, at their proper time. A change must take over here; old prejudices that consider politics as a man's business, have to be abolished. For it is no longer true that the female intelligentsia in Switzerland are perfectly happy with the status quo. The number of women working for their living increases continuously and it seems ludicrous that they must formally ask their husband's permission before taking a job. For centuries, the husband has been the head of the family. The new conception of marriage sees a partnership between two equal members, and the old saying is still true, namely 'zu Hause muss beginnen, was leuchten soll im Vaterland'.

Women trusted men for a long time and hoped by waiting patiently, the obvious injustice would be changed. Their confidence was not satisfied, only decisive actions could possibly point out how urgent matters had become. And they felt the time had come when the Federal Council was going to sign the Convention of Human Rights. A new chain of movements was started to fight for equal positions of women everywhere. This ranged from 'equal pay for equal work' and 'recognition of the housewife as member of a professional category of its own' to 'equal education and access to political office and careers'.

1st February, 1969, was a day of stating the actual standpoint. Ten years ago, Swiss citizens rejected by vote electoral and voting rights for women with 66.9%. But a first step was made: the Canton of Vaud introduced civil rights in cantonal and communal affairs, and shortly afterwards Geneva and Neuchâtel followed. Baselstadt was the pioneer in German-speaking Switzerland, Grisons and Berne tried a new way by gradually introducing civil rights in Communes which has proved successful. There were still several rejections: Zurich, Lucerne and Ticino contained a large No-majority while other Cantons have not even thought of offering a vote.

This year's celebration was disturbed by disagreement between radical left-wing organisations of women-students who plead for a complete change of structure throughout the society and the traditional women's associations. It led to the decision that the latter would boycott the planned march on Berne on 1st March. This demonstration, designed to show disapproval of Parliament's near-certain decision to sign the Council of Europe's Human Rights Declaration, was jinxed from the start. The crowd of about 500 activist women, about 300 men and some children who assembled before the Bundeshaus was a mere reflection of what it could have been. On the morning, 41 top women's organisations met with representatives of the Federal Government in the Berne Casino. The presidents of five leading associations quietly explained the hypocrisy of signing a Declaration with the condition that women are not given equal political rights. Then most of them went home. What took place in the afternoon's demonstration, was Switzerland's New Left, waving the red flag, the anarchist black flag, trying to confuse the goals of the average middle-class students with socially acceptable political ideas with their economic and sexual credo. They do not represent the feelings of the majority, and with their take-over of the march, they managed to leave a sour taste in the mouth of many active Swiss women. Many are hoping that the march's failure will spur associations and leaders into efficient organisation and realisation of the impact of publicity and not set back Swiss women's achievement of equality.

Long discussions afterwards, both in public, Press and Parliament led to the achievement that Federal President L. von Moos announced that a new project for the introduction of women's civil rights will be submitted to the two Chambers before the end of the year.

At the Conservatoire, the traditional master Courses on piano (Mieczysław Horszowski), violin (Wolfgang Schneiderhan), cello and chamber music (Enrico Mainardi) and for singers (Franziska Martienssen and Paul Lohmann) will take place.

Concours Clara Haskil 1969

Prior to the Festival of Music, i.e. between 30th July and 9th August, the Concours Clara Haskil will be held again. Highly promising candidates have sent in their names, but six of them at most will be asked by the jury to take the final examination, which will be held in the form of public concerts (7th, 8th and 9th August) and will comprise a half-hour recital and a concerto by each candidate. Concerts will be accompanied by an orchestra consisting of members of the Swiss Festival Orchestra to be conducted by Charles Dutoit. Programmes can, of course, be published only shortly before the actual concerts, but tickets are available (Concluded on page 11)
