PARLIAMENTARY SUMMER SESSION

This year's summer session of the two Swiss Chambers coincided with the outbreak of hostilities in the Near East, and the atmosphere was depressed. The Parties would have liked to issue a communal declaration regarding the crisis, but they were not successful, and it was left to them to make individual statements. These were unanimously in sympathy with Israel, giving a true picture of the feeling of the Swiss population.

The first week saw the Council of States accept the report on development aid, though there were warning voices regarding help to countries which had prepared the war.

With 111 : 12 votes, Parliament supported the opinion of the Government that it was a Kollegialbehörde and as such should retain the power to distribute the Federal Department. The Motion that Parliament should be the deciding factor was thus defeated. Parliament also rejected a proposal that speeches in the Chambers should be impromptu and not read from full manuscripts.

The National Council approved unanimously the accounts for 1966, which showed a surplus of 5m. as against a budgeted loss of 238m. francs. Against the Government, Parliament decided on an unconditional tax amnesty. There was also strong opposition to the double taxation agreement with France. Finance Minister Bonvin also accepted a Postulate regarding an increase in pay for the federal employees.

Partial revision of the Military Penal Law was tackled by the National Council, with its proposed changes for more enlightened treatment of conscientious objectors. But some kind of civilian service is still not acceptable.

In the second week, the traditional summer outings of the Parties took place, and amongst the business in the National Council was the report by the Government on its activities in 1966. The debate included Switzerland's attitude to United Nations. Entry should and would be studied, but one thing was certain that a plebiscite at this moment would be fruitless.

Without opposition, the Council of States granted 300m. francs for military buildings and shooting centres, a walking-out coat and rain-coat for the soldier.

In the third week, the debate of the Geschäftsbericht brought some sharp criticism to bear regarding reduced services of the PTT, which affects the daily papers rather badly. The reduction in service could only be made good by a further 1,000 staff, now that the PTT personnel has been granted shorter hours as from 1st January 1968.

The reorganisation of the Federal Military Department did not cause much concern in the National Council because of the excellent preparatory work and hearings which had been done by the 27 members of the Commission.

A fourth week had to be added to the session, and even so, the National Council was not quite able to complete its business. The main debate concerned the tobacco tax law. The Government was of opinion that Swiss legislation should fall in line with EFTA demands which are for the same tobacco duty on inland and imported smokes. Heated arguments for and against price maintenance finally resulted in a 74 : 72 vote for it.

A unanimous vote for a considerable improvement in the invalidity insurance was passed by the Council of States. And the National Council dealt with a few interesting questions shortly before the end of the session. This provided the welcome opportunity to praise the results of the Kennedy Round negotiations and to deplore the division in the Common Market. The Swiss application is still pending and will remain so for the time being.
